Mr. HULL. Certainly, and we do manufacture under this a great deal of material for the small arms, but not the powder.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the word "ammunition" mean powder?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes; and what powder is made of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the gentleman is contending that this means something that it is construed to mean rather than what it says.

Mr. HULL. It means what it says.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point I am trying to make is that there is a provision in here for the manufacture of powder.

Mr. HULL. Not only for powder and ammunition, but material for small arms.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then any provision touching the manufacture of powder is germane to this bill.

Mr. HULL. I have not raised that question. On the proposition of the gentleman's amendment I want to talk for a moment. I want to say to the House that if the amendment shall be adopted you absolutely tie up the hands of the Government so that it can not accumulate any ammunition at all. You would have to go into the courts to determine, or anyone could put you into the courts to determine whether there was a combination to manufacture the powder of this country, which is purchased by the Government.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Will the gentleman from Iowa admit that the trust does exist and that the Government can't get it anywhere else?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Iowa is not lawyer enough to draw the line where a large corporation is running its business to determine whether it is a trust combination, a monopoly, or a strictly legitimate business. That is a question for the law officers of the Government. But you would tie up the appropriation until it was determined in the courts. Now, I want to say to the gentleman that when the proposition to manufacture comes before the House in a proper way I will support that proposition. It could not come from the Committee on Military Affairs, but until the time comes that we shall manufacture for ourselves I protest against tying the hands of the Government so that it will be powerless, in the face of the world, to accumulate any supply of ammunition.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I submit that if we adopt this amendment that it will pave the way for manufacturing our own powder.

Mr. HULL. Oh, no; it would say in effect that for a year the Government could not accumulate smokeless powder anywhere. It says until the Government manufactures we shall not accumulate anything. It does not pave the way, and I sincerely hope that this House, on both sides, will vote against an amendment so mischievous in character, so well calculated to work injury to the interests of the country.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before this section is left I move to strike out, in line 21, the word "six" and substitute for it the word "nine;" so that it will read "nine hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars," instead of "six hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars."

Now, I will state why I offer that amendment. That clause reads as follows:

Ordnance stores, ammunition, manufacture or purchase of ammunition, etc.—

For several purposes, and then appropriates $629,000. I offer to make it $929,000 in order, without being subject to the point of order, to furnish, under the proviso of the bill providing for the manufacture of powder, a sufficient amount of money for the Government to manufacture powder at its own works. The gentleman from Iowa has just stated that if a resolution was offered for the Government to manufacture its own powder, he would vote for it. Here is his chance. I offer the amendment to give him his chance. This amendment is not subject to a point of order. It merely increases the amount of the appropriation, and it will give the Government money enough, at least, to begin to manufacture its own powder so as not to leave us in the helpless condition that the gentleman from Iowa has just said that we are now in. If we pass the resolution offered by Mr. GILLESPIE, of Texas, not to buy powder from any trust, even a convicted trust under the antitrust laws of the United States, the gentleman from Iowa admits that we would now find ourselves completely cut off from the power to buy powder at all, and our hands, under the resolution, would be completely tied.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman's amendment would be effective, I would feel very kindly disposed toward it, but the gentleman is too good a parliamentarian, as a leader of the minority, and too good a lawyer to believe for one minute that if we were to make an appropriation even of $3,000,000, in place of his $900,000, that one penny of it could be used for the erection of buildings or the purchase or installation of machinery for the manufacture of powder. That can only be brought about by this House appropriating specifically for the erection of the building and the installation of machinery. Under the rules of the House, and under the decisions of the Chair, it would not be in order to offer that on this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the House that the Committee on Military Affairs has not cut down——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman passes from that I want to say a word. He says that not a penny of this will be devoted to the purpose of manufacturing powder.

Mr. HULL. No; I did not say that. I said for the erection of buildings and the installation of machinery.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the Government already manufacturing powder at Indian Head?

Mr. HULL. We are buying nitrates and accumulating supplies for the Army. At Indian Head the Navy has a small powder plant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that be true, the Executive Department is now spending the money for the purpose it has been appropriated for. This very clause appropriates a part of the money carried by it for the manufacture of powder. If the gentleman admits that the Departments of this Government, under the present Administration, will not welcome an opportunity, where the money appropriated for them enables them to do so, to get out of the clutches of this great powder trust, which is one of the most immense grafts in this country, then I stand corrected. But I am not ready to admit that the Government of the United States would not be glad to use this $300,000 for the purpose of escaping the present exploitation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, let the gentleman then offer an amendment here and get unanimous consent, appropriating $300,000 for the erection of a building and the installation of machinery to manufacture smokeless powder, and then if his amendment would go through it would be of some use; but, Mr. Chairman, this amendment is of no value for the reason that if made not a dollar of it could be used for the purpose the gentleman has in his mind. Not only that, but I want to say in the creation of reserve ammunition, in the supply of reserve arms, the Committee on Military Affairs has given to the Ordnance Department every dollar that it asked for.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa having invited me to ask unanimous consent for the following resolution, I shall now do so.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I would prefer the gentleman to say that I suggested a way to the gentleman rather than that I invited him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 21, after the word "Homes," strike out the words "six hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "$929,000, $300,000 of which shall be expended for the erection of a plant for the manufacture of powder."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the Chair sustained the point of order so soon that I did not get an opportunity to discuss it. I desired to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] a question, if he will reserve his point for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi move to strike out the last word?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I will move to strike out the last word. I might just as well ask it here. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if he is in collusion with the imputed intention of the executive department not to get out from the clutch of this powder trust; and if he is not, why he made the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi, in the first place, that it is not established that the Chief Executive is in collusion with the powder trust, and in the next place, if he is, I am not in sympathy with it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say the Chief Executive was in collusion with the powder trust.

Mr. TAWNEY. But the gentleman's question implied that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked if the gentleman was in collusion with the imputed intention—imputed by the gentleman from Iowa—imputed intention of the Executive Departments not to try to get out from the clutch of this trust.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Iowa made no such imputation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I asked the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] if he is not, why he made the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because this is not the way to get out. If we are in the clutches of the powder trust, this is not the way to get out of its clutches.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will take my five minutes on that point. Mr. Chairman, I am much fonder of things substantial than I am of things parliamentary. The gentleman says that he makes the point of order because this is not the right place for the legislation. Every place is the right place to do right, and if the gentleman thinks that we ought not to be paying 65 cents to the Dupont powder trust for powder which can be made and sold for 40 cents, then he should leave it to somebody who thinks it is right to do that to make the point of order. There are two ways of voting against a bill. One is to vote against it and the other is to make a point of order against it. There are two ways of voting against an attempt to get out of the clutch of a trust. One is to vote against it when the proposition is presented in a separate bill and the other is to make the point of order against it when you are trying to get it upon a bill. The gentleman is the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations. The country will understand that in making this point of order he is representing the policy of his party, and the country can not be deceived with the notion that he makes it merely because he has some sort of a religion of fetish worship about the rules of the House. He is not sworn to make a point of order. It is not his duty to make a point of order. He makes it in pursuance of a policy, and being the chairman of that great committee he is making it in pursuance of the policy of his party.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just in a moment. If the gentleman had taken the position that he did not think any trust was selling the powder and that he was not in sympathy with the idea of getting out from its clutches, he could have stood upon safe ground, but when he says he is in sympathy with the idea of escaping from its clutches and then makes a point of order on a proviso offered to this bill, which is the only present available opportunity to escape that is furnished him, he is upon thin ice. Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman's amendment provides for nothing except an appropriation of $300,000 for the construction of a powder factory?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. In what way will that amendment destroy this alleged powder trust?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will tell the gentleman. In the language of the gentleman from Iowa, it would take ten or twelve years time now to get the plant fully furnished and equipped, and this $300,000 is the beginning of a Government plant, and, therefore, of the end of the powder-trust clutch. It will not be the end of it now, but it is the beginning of its hold on the Government, and I made it a small item on purpose, so we could start with the building at this time and then, as room is furnished, get the plant ready, and then we can go ahead and make the powder.

Mr. TAWNEY. What would be the capacity of a powder plant costing $300,000?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not believe it would be very large, but if——

Mr. TAWNEY. Can you give the House any idea? I want to find out how much you know about destroying the powder trust and of the capacity of a plant costing $300,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it is a beginning in that direction. I know it is a precedent set, and I know if set it will be followed, and now, "a Daniel having come to judgment," I will ask the gentleman these two questions. The first one is, How much do you think would be necessary as an appropriation right now? Would a million do?

Mr. TAWNEY. For the erection of a powder plant?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and to equip it this year.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know what the consumption of the United States is, and I was going to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he knew.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, this is not to make powder for the world, or even for the United States; it is to make powder for the Army and Navy. We can ascertain the amount purchased by the Army and Navy each year, and it seems to me a building costing $300,000 ought to be big enough to contain equipment enough to provide all that the Army and Navy need, but now that such a plant necessary may be put down, I now promise the gentleman if he thinks this amount is not all that is necessary to erect a building for beginning the work, I will put it at any figure he thinks proper.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then how do you know that $300,000 is not sufficient?

Mr. TAWNEY. I know that will provide for a plant producing 3,000 pounds a day, that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This amendment contemplates only for the building, that is all. It will build a house big enough to contain the machinery. We can equip it later.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if he can tell the House what sum would have been necessary for "the machinery necessary for manufacturing ammunition at arsenals?"

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, the understanding we had from the Chief of Ordnance was that it was only a small amount, that it was used more for repairs. The Committee on Military Affairs did not claim to have jurisdiction over the installation of any new plant.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, can the gentleman give the House any figures? Would it cost $5,000 or $10,000 or $20,000?

Mr. HULL. They said if they wanted small repairs they would get them out of this. Some years it would cost only $5,000, some years $10,000, and some years less.

Mr. SHERLEY. I presume the gentlemen in fixing on the sum asked for, $629,000, had some estimate upon which to base the figures.

Mr. HULL. No; the estimate on that was very small and varied so it was not considered as cutting any figure at all one way or another in the appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. You ask $629,000 as being necessary for the ammunition without regard to the machinery?

Mr. HULL. No; I should imagine there was probably a few thousand dollars put in there for repairs.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason why I ask the gentleman this question is this: It appears if we strike out some item on a point of order we are worse off than if we do not, because you keep the same sum and expend more money for less purposes.

Mr. HULL. I would say this: As far as that is concerned, an amendment to reduce it $29,000 would not meet with any objection on my part, as I had the feeling, to be frank with you, that any surplus that was saved out of this item could be put into reserve ammunition to good advantage.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire then to offer the following amendment:

On page 43, line 21, strike out the words "and twenty-nine," so that the appropriation will read "six hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to reenforce, if I can, in my humble way, the argument made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and point out to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that whatever theory he may base his attitude upon, the fact remains he is standing by his objection, by having raised this point of order, between the Government of the United States and the exactions of the great powder trust. I do not believe the Government ought to go into the business of manufacturing as a general principle, but there are some cases where it may properly do so. For example, all of those things which are necessary for the defense of this Government ought to be provided by the Government itself, either wholly or at least partially. The Government should not be made dependent for its supply of powder upon trusts in the United States or upon importation. In time of war it might not be easy to import powder. In time of war domestic trusts would increase the price enormously, and there ought to be left in the Government some means of defending itself against the exactions of the manufacturers of powder abroad and the trusts that manufacture it at home. And therefore if the gentleman did not make his point of order and even a small beginning were made by the establishment of a small plant for the manufacture of powder, we could increase the size of that plant so that in war times we could manufacture powder and not be dependent upon the trusts here or upon the manufacturers of powder abroad.

The Clerk read as follows:

Small-arms target practice: Ammunition, targets, and other accessories, for small-arms target practice and instruction; marksmen's medals, prize arms, and insignia for all arms of the service; and for the machinery necessary for their manufacture at arsenals, $1,200,000.

Mr. HULL. According to the ruling of the Chair, the words "machinery necessary for their manufacture at arsenals" should go out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the alteration in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer this amendment:

In line 23, page 43, after the word "ammunition," insert "which shall be manufactured by the Government."

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that we have already passed that paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; we have not. The Clerk just this minute read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43, line 23, after the word "ammunition," insert "which shall be manufactured by the Government."

Mr. TAWNEY. We just struck out part of lines 1 and 2, on page 44, after the conclusion of the reading of that paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not all of the paragraph was stricken out, but only a part of it, and this applies to the part not stricken out.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order made on the ground that the paragraph has been read. That is the only ground on which it was made.

Mr. HULL. I understood him to make it on other grounds.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] offered his amendment at the bottom of page 43, in line 22. If that is not the fact, then I make the point of order that it is unauthorized by law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HULL. Let us decide the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], as the Chair understood it, was in line 23, on page 43, in a paragraph which had not come to its conclusion until the end of line 3, on page 44. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] made a point of order that the paragraph had been passed. That point of order the Chair overruled.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi followed the word "dollars" in line 22, at the end of the paragraph of "ordnance, stores, and ammunition."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 23, after the word "ammunition," insert "which shall be manufactured by the Government."

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is for an object not authorized by law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that point of order, Mr. Chairman, I will reply simply that this is a restriction upon the sort of powder to be procured, and the places whence to be bought. It is a limitation upon the language of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman——

Mr. TAWNEY. It would cause the Government to go into the construction of a new line of work.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Government is already making powder, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether the Government now has a manufactory for the manufacture of this powder?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Government is now manufacturing powder. On page 43, line 10, beginning the clause immediately prior to this, the bill says that there shall be appropriated $629,000 for a certain purpose, and one of them is, you will find, on line 10, a provision for "manufacture or purchase of ammunition." So that the Government is now manufacturing powder by law. Whether the War Department is doing it in fact or not I do not know. But I understand it is doing it as a matter of fact.

Mr. HULL. In the matter of manufacturing a powder, there is a manufacture of powder for the Navy. If we start to manufacture, this would carry it right on. We do manufacture some of the material, but we do not manufacture the powder.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether, as a matter of fact, or not the War Department manufactures any powders or has ever manufactured any or not, but I do know that there is authority of law for it in existing law, and that therefore this is a limitation of the manner and method—a restriction. It makes no difference, so far as the point of order is concerned, whether a pound is really ever manufactured or not by the Army Department. The fact is that it is manufactured by the Navy Department; but if the War Department wants to manufacture it authority of law is here already for the manufacture of powder.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there is a point of order raised.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to be heard, Mr. Chairman, on the inquiry that the Chair has just made. I want to read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, made to the Fifty-sixth Congress, and directly on that point, under the head of "Powder," page 30:

The Government powder factory at Indian Head is progressing favorably and will be completed in a few months. Unavoidable delays in obtaining materials have retarded its progress to some extent, and it is preferable to do good rather than hasty work. It is neither expected nor desired to enter into competition at these works with private manufacturers, except as to quality, it being the policy of the Department to foster the commercial industry, upon which the country must largely draw for its supply.

Also I want to read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy of November 17, 1900, on page 13, in which he says:

Manufacturers of smokeless powder are now experiencing little difficulty in supplying powder of excellent quality which meets the required climatic, physical, and ballistic tests. Three of the battle ships and one cruiser have already received an outfit of smokeless powder, and other vessels will be supplied as they are commissioned.

The manufacture of smokeless powder by the Government has been successfully carried on during the past year.

So, as a matter of fact, we are making powder. I do not know how much we are making, but this amendment simply enlarges the appropriation for manufacturing powder by the Government, and is not new legislation and does not change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi provides that out of the $1,200,000 appropriated, in so far as it relates to ammunition, it shall be expended for ammunition which shall be manufactured by the Government.

Now, the present occupant of this chair thinks that the decision of this question must be based exclusively upon the facts in the case, not upon the language in this or other bills concerning the purchase or manufacture of ammunition, but upon the actual facts of the case. If the Government, in any of its departments, has no facilities for manufacturing powder, then this amendment would have a tendency to force the Government into establishing a manufactory for the purpose of making powder. If, however, as appears from the facts brought forth in this debate, the Government of the United States is manufacturing ammunition, it would seem that this amendment is simply a limitation and merely prescribes the method in which this money shall be expended; and if there is no contradiction of the fact that the Government is manufacturing powder, the Chair would hold the amendment is in order as a limitation, and overrules the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Chairman!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 81.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. HULL and Mr. WILLIAMS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 85.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at the end of line 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

At the end of line 22, on page 43, insert:

"And it is hereby declared to be the fixed policy of the Government to enter upon the manufacture of all powder needed for use of the Army and the Navy."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on that for two reasons. One is that we have passed that paragraph and proceeded to the next one, and the other is that it is entirely a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. It is only necessary to pass upon the first point. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 2, page 44, the words "two hundred thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 44, in lines 2 and 3, strike out "two hundred thousand;" so that it will read "one million dollars."

Mr. HULL. We have stricken out all about machinery.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman if that $200,000 covers the amount necessary for the building of machinery?

Mr. HULL. I should say that would amply cover it, because it is not so much for building machinery as it is supplying machines to replace old ones. My understanding is that it will more than cover it.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is all right. I had intended to offer a similar amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores and supplies: For overhauling, cleaning, repairing, and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores in the hands of troops and at the arsenals, posts, and depots; for purchase and manufacture of ordnance stores to fill requisitions of troops; for infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipments, including horse equipments for cavalry and artillery, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at arsenals, $1,185,000.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the words in lines 3 and 4, after "artillery," down to and including "arsenals," are out of order in this bill, and ought to go out, under the previous ruling of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will make the alteration.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

National trophy and medals for rifle contests: That for the purpose of furnishing a national trophy and medals and other prizes to be provided and contested for annually, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, said contest to be open to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the National Guard or organized militia of the several States, Territories, and of the District of Columbia, and for the cost of the trophy, prizes, and medals herein provided for, and for the promotion of rifle practice, the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended for the purposes hereinbefore prescribed under the direction of the Secretary of War, $5,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 15, including the word "appropriated," in line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 45, in lines 15, 16, and 17, strike out the words "be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MADDEN. That would make the item read:

And for the promotion of rifle practice the sum of $5,000, to be expended for the purposes hereinbefore prescribed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to that amendment at all.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems superfluous to have that language there.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter all funds received as the value of military stores transferred by the several staff departments of the Army to the Insular Department of the Philippines, or work done, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and remain available during the fiscal year in which the transaction occurred and the following year for the procurement of like military stores to replace those so transferred.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the paragraph just read, because it seems to be a duplicate of one printed on page 46, commencing at line 17 and running down to line 23.

Mr. HULL. No; they are different propositions.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the Ordnance Department, under existing regulations, procures stores for other Executive Departments or bureaus, including the Philippine government, its appropriations shall be applicable to defray the necessary expenses in connection with the procurement, subject to reimbursement from time to time, or on completion of the work, from the department or bureau for which the stores were procured.

Hereafter the purchase of supplies and the procurement of services for all branches of the Army service may be made in open market, in the manner common among business men, when the aggregate of the amount required does not exceed $500; but every such purchase shall be promptly reported to the Secretary of War for approval, under such regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the point of order, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Iowa a question or two about these paragraphs.

Mr. HULL. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not making the point of order; but does not this first paragraph, on page 46, have the effect of increasing the appropriation heretofore made for that purpose?

Mr. HULL. Do you mean the Ordnance Department? No; I think not. The Ordnance Department under existing regulations does procure stores for some other Executive Departments and bureaus, and especially the Philippine government. They have repaired their guns at the expense of the General Government. They furnish guns to the constabulary. They take charge of that, and they sell guns.

Now, they pay out of the insular treasury for this work; but unless you have this provision the Ordnance Department is crippled to that extent, because in place of being able to reuse that money in the way it was appropriated for they are short the amount that they furnish to the Philippine government.

Mr. TAWNEY. In the next paragraph, on which this point of order is reserved, I would like to have the gentleman's opinion as to whether it will not result in an increase of appropriation there.

Mr. HULL. Yes; it will. There is a $300 increase there, and it puts in the Medical Department as well as the others.

Mr. TAWNEY. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

All funds received as the value of military stores transferred by the several staff departments of the Army to the insular department of the Philippines, or work done, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and remain available during the fiscal year in which the transaction occurred and during the following year for the procurement of military stores.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have the chairman explain that provision.

Mr. HULL. That is on the line of the provision we had last year. House Document 424 shows that the provision in the Army bill for this fiscal year contains the following provision:

All funds received as the value of military stores transferred by the several staff departments of the Army to the insular department of the Philippines shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and remain available during the fiscal year 1906 for the procurement of like military stores to replace those so transferred.

Now, this makes it available for the fiscal year and the following year, because the way it was passed last year it was not effective.

Mr. TAWNEY. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am still of the opinion that commencing on line 17, page 46, is a duplication of that which is contained in line 20 and following on page 45. If the chairman of the committee can explain why it is not a duplicate, I would like to have him do it; otherwise I want to reserve a point of order until I hear what he has to say.

Mr. HULL. My impression is that the gentleman from Illinois is right and that from line 17 to line 23, on page 46, should be stricken out.

Mr. MADDEN. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the paragraph commencing in line 17 and ending in line 23, on page 46, be stricken out.

Mr. HULL. I think that is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to prepare the ground and suitably mark the graves of soldiers and sailors buried on Isle St. Michel, commonly known as "Crab Island," the sum of $20,000, or such portion thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Insert, after line 3, on page 47, the following:

That a commission is hereby created to be known as the Confederate Memorial Commission, to consist of three members, who shall receive an annual salary of $5,000 per year, payable monthly. The President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint the commission from veterans of the Union and Confederate armies. Vacancies occurring therein shall be filled in the same manner. It shall have the authority and exercise the powers herein set forth under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers and the direction of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall organize within thirty days after its appointment by the selection of such officers as may be required in the performance of its duties, and shall also adopt rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, to govern its deliberations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the said commission to mature and adopt such plan or plans, from examinations already made of the graves of Confederate soldiers, looking to the preservation, protection, and beautifying of the same, and shall supervise the expenditure of any moneys appropriated by Congress looking to the protection, care, and beautifying of the graves of Confederate soldiers, which disbursements shall be audited by the Auditor for the War Department.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman from California to reserve his point of order until I can be heard.

Mr. KAHN. I will reserve it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I note that the committee in this appropriation bill reports an item here "to enable the Secretary of War to prepare the ground and suitably mark the graves of soldiers and sailors buried on Isle St. Michel, commonly known as 'Crab Island,' the sum of $20,000." Of course the item would be, in all probability, subject to a point of order if the point of order were made, which I do not propose to make against that item in the bill. But I want to say that the amendment I have offered is along the same lines. The amendment offered by the committee in the bill proposes to take care of the Union soldiers.

Mr. HULL. Oh, no; of the war of 1812.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, they are soldiers of the United States and still Union soldiers. The provision that I offer here is along the lines of the bill, I think, and of a bill that has already been reported to this House by the Committee on Military Affairs to mark the graves of the Confederate soldiers.

Mr. KEIFER. On that island?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it is a general bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been the sweet pleasure for the women of the South to decorate and, as far as lay in their power, to preserve the graves of the Confederate soldiers; but it is beyond their power to accomplish that which I believe we owe to the future. I believe the graves of the northern soldiers and Confederate soldiers belong to the country; that no country ever amounted to anything that has not a history, and that unless we preserve the history of our country we are on the downward grade. The bravery and glory of those who bore our flag, whether they were on the northern side or on the southern side of the line, is a part of the glory of our country; and we owe it to the children of our country, whether they come from southern blood or from northern blood, to mark the graves of their forefathers. Now, this bill or this amendment which I offer does not contemplate a large expenditure of money at any time. It certainly does not contemplate a large expenditure now; but I will say that through the southern country there are a few cemeteries where a Confederate soldier is buried that monuments have been erected over the graves of that private soldier. Many of these plats are still extant where you could locate the grave of the particular soldier and erect a headstone for that particular man at that grave.

If you let time run much further, those tablets, those memoranda of records from which you can erect these monuments will have gone, and then it will be impossible to do so in the future. Now, all this amendment provides is the appointment of three commissioners from the Confederate and from the Union armies—old soldiers on both sides—to collect these records and report to Congress what we should do in reference to the preserving of the Confederate graves. It is a matter in which the whole country is interested. It is no more out of order than the provision in the bill that has just preceded it, and I hope the point of order will not be made.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the Committee on Military Affairs by unanimous vote this morning reported out the Senate bill known as the "Foraker bill," fixed up by amendment exactly as the women of the South asked us.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But this is the same thing.

Mr. HULL. No; it is not the same thing, and we put $200,000 in that bill, and when we take that bill up and pass it through the House it can become a law before this one. There is no use of loading down the appropriation bill with it. It is true this is just as much in order as the proviso which precedes it, but the time for raising the point of order on that has passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not intend to raise the point of order.

Mr. HULL. We wanted to do just what the good women of the South, who cherish in their hearts the memory of their brave who are buried near northern prisons, desired, and we have made all the requirements that the South has asked of us—North and South on the committee uniting to do this work as one of the peace offerings of this time to all the passions of the past. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me just a moment, I will say this: I appreciate, as a southern man, what the committee has done, so far as the Foraker bill is concerned. I believe it is right; but that bill applies merely to the graves near northern prisons. Now, I think that the soldier who died south of the Mason and Dixon line is just as near and dear to the hearts of his people as any Confederate soldier who died north of that line.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the Confederates who appeared before us on that proposition say that where their dead lie in their own neighborhoods and among their own people the South does not ask and does not expect and would not tolerate the Federal Government taking charge of those graves.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that some people have said that, but I have received petitions, and a number of them, that desire this very thing to be done as to the southern graves. Now, I will state that I have received letters from these ladies the gentleman speaks of. They have beautified the graves; but I can point to a number of cemeteries in the South where to-day there is not a monument raised. It is true the cemeteries are kept clean; they are beautified as far as our people have the money to beautify them; but they have not erected any headstones to mark out where the individual soldier lies, where his people can come and find him in the future. They have not the money to do it. The Federal Government has the money, and I think it would be a proper tribute to the glory of these people.

Mr. KAHN and Mr. HARDWICK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from California.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama until he can answer the question of his colleague.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman this question, if this does not correctly represent the position of the ladies of the South on this question. I hold in my hand this letter from the Ladies' Memorial Association of Georgia, in which they say that they are in favor of the provisions of the Foraker bill only, and that they do not desire that any special care be given by the Government to any Confederate graves in the South.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I do not so understand the letter. My understanding of the letter was that they preferred the Foraker bill to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], because the Foraker bill provided for a commission to look after these matters, instead of subordinate employees of the War Department.

Mr. HARDWICK. The concluding sentence of the letter, I will state, is this:

> The decided preference of these associations is for the provisions of the Foraker bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I have had letters myself from the ladies in reference to this bill that I have introduced, and the objection was to the Prince bill, not to the idea of taking care of the graves in the South. The objection was to not having officers of the Union and Confederate armies of high character and standing to do this work. That is what they want.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, as the son of a Confederate soldier who is very proud of being one, I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will withdraw his amendment. I have received letters from Gen. Stephen D. Lee, the last lieutenant-general of the Confederacy and the chief of the Order of United Confederate Veterans; I have received letters from Mrs. Lizzie George Henderson, the head of the Daughters of the Confederacy; from Mrs. Behan, at the Southern Memorial Society, and I have received letters from the Sons of Confederate Veterans of the various camps, all united in requesting that the Foraker bill be reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to the House just as it passed the Senate, and all saying that it would be perfectly satisfactory to them from every standpoint, sentiment being the most precious of all. All of us I think are united in this. I think no daughter and no son of a Confederate veteran whose body is safely buried within the soil of his own country desires anybody else except the family of the buried soldier to decorate and keep his grave. [Applause.] I am not asking even the legislation which the Committee on Military Affairs is going to report, except for the reason that the graves are upon northern soil adjacent to prisons held by the Federal Government during the war, outside of Dixieland, and it is not possible for us to give them the care and attention which people like to give to the graves of those whom they respect. I hope that nothing will be done to interfere with the passage of the bill which the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is going to bring into the House, which I understand is the bill passed by the Senate.

Mr. HULL. There is only one amendment, and that is agreed upon by the Daughters of the Confederacy, and that is simply in regard to the purchase of the land, in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. HULL. That is the only change made in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Ohio desires to address the Chair, and I have no desire to interfere with him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with profound admiration to the remarks made by the gentleman from Mississippi. During the last Congress the so-called "Foraker bill" had been passed by the Senate, and at the request of the distinguished Senator, who was also for his age a most distinguished soldier, I looked after the interest of that bill in this House, and tried in various ways to reach an opportunity to have it passed. During the time it was pending I heard from not only Members on this floor who were ex-Confederate soldiers, but from a great many gentlemen who came to the city, and during the recess between the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses I heard a great deal in the southern cities about the so-called "Foraker bill." I understand that what the gentleman from Mississippi has said is exactly a correct statement of the public sentiment of the South. Their anxiety for the passage of the Foraker bill is not that they are not abundantly able and abundantly willing to do all that they could do to carry out their sentimental, patriotic, and affectionate purposes, but it is because the Federal Government has the data upon which alone this purpose could be carried into execution.

I might refer to Johnsons Island, a beautiful spot, where, under the superintendency of the Federal Government, these unfortunate soldiers were laid to rest, and whatever of data, whatever of identication there remain are in the hands of the Federal Government, and the same may be said of the surroundings of hospitals and prisons in Chicago and elsewhere—in the North and in the South—and it was the patriotic purpose of Congress, Mr. Chairman—not of the North, not of the South—but it was the patriotic purpose of the Congress of the United States, in the discharge of its duty, to do what was proposed to be done. [Applause.] It was not an offer coming from the North to be executed as a gratuity to the South, but it was an act of humanity, of decency, of loyalty and good fellowship, with a purpose to put one more flower over the chasm we have been trying to close up for so many years. [Applause.] So I hope that there will be no opposition coming upon this floor when that bill shall come up, nor yet in the form of amendment to the pending bill, that seeks to supersede the operation of the Foraker bill. Let that bill be accepted in the spirit in which it has come here and it will go a long way to carry out the suggestion that McKinley made, that Roosevelt has made, and to which every patriotic lover of his country to-day says Amen. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I received in the mail yesterday morning a letter, which I desire to call to the attention of the committee. It is as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., February 24, 1906.

Hon. W. T. HARDWICK,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: The Ladies' Memorial Association, of this city, representing, as they believe, the strong sentiment of all similar associations in Georgia, respectfully urge that your sympathetic attention be given to the measures now pending in Congress concerning the care of Confederate graves, by our Government.

The ladies of these associations feel that they can not show too earnestly their great concern that the graves of those brave soldiers of the Confederate as well as of the Union Armies who died in service or were killed in battle should not become a reproach to our country or to any part of its people on account of neglect.

These associations have not failed to prevent this reproach so far as the graves are accessible, but thousands of southern soldiers died and were buried far away, where their graves have no proper care. For these graves especially they make this appeal to Congress, and pray that their voice may be favorably heard. The decided preference of these associations is for the provisions of the Foraker bill, and they respectfully urge their adoption.

Very truly, yours,

Mrs. W. D. ELLIS,
President Ladies' Memorial Association of Atlanta, Ga.
Mrs. JOSEPH MORGAN,
Mrs. S. H. MELONE,
Miss LUCY EVANS.
Committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am utterly opposed to the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], even if the point of order against it be not insisted upon. So far as the South is concerned, our ladies have demonstrated, in splendid loyalty and in touching love, their ability to take care of the Confederate graves that are located in our own midst. And we do not ask and we do not desire, and I believe I speak the overwhelming sentiment of the South when I say that we would not appreciate the aid there. We can take care of the graves of our own dead whenever they are on our own soil. The memorial associations everywhere ask only that Congress give this aid under circumstances detailed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]—namely, when those graves are away from the South, where the loving care of the women of the South can not reach them.

I therefore respectfully submit, in the interest and in behalf of the ladies of the South, that the passage of any such amendment as this would be, whether intentional or not—and I know that it would be unintentional—a reflection upon that tender love and grateful care which the women of the South have ever bestowed, in our own land, upon the graves of our dead. And I earnestly hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will not insist upon his motion. [Applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, in the beginning of this Congress Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill in the Senate to mark the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate Army and Navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes. A bill identical with the bill that Senator FORAKER introduced was introduced by me in the House. The bill introduced by the Senator was referred to the appropriate committee of the Senate, and they reported his original bill with certain amendments. During the time this proceeding was going on in the Senate like action was being taken in the House on the bill I introduced. The Comittee on Military Affairs made some amendments to that bill. They reported it to the House and it is now on the Calendar. In the meantime, as the two bills as amended came before the country they brought the attention of those who are directly interested in the result. After much discussion on the part of the Confederate soldiers of the South and on the part of the Daughters of the Confederacy, they were led to believe, and I do not question their judgment, that they preferred the Foraker bill as amended to the Prince bill as amended.

To-day we had a hearing before the Military Committee. There appeared before us a gentleman in behalf of the Southern Confederacy Memorial Association, and one of its principal officers. There also appeared before us a lady, who is a historian of the Daughters of the Confederacy. We gave them a hearing, and as a result of that hearing the committee unanimously agreed upon, and authorized me to report to the House, the Foraker bill as it is, with a slight amendment.

I desire to say that much, so that the House will know that it is the unanimous desire of the Committee on Military Affairs to carry out the wishes of the representatives of the late Southern Confederacy and the representatives of the Daughters of the late Southern Confederacy. That bill, as I have said, was reported to-day and will be on the Calendar. At the earliest moment that the House will permit me under its rules, or otherwise, to take that bill up I stand ready to present it, and I ask that it be unanimously voted for by the Members of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to yield to me just a minute.

Mr. Chairman, I think the House does not understand from what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] have said what the purport of this bill is. Now, I want to say in the beginning that when I arose and offered this amendment I did not know that the Military Committee had reported the Foraker bill. It was only reported this morning. Necessarily being in the records and undisclosed, I had no way of obtaining that information, not being a member of the committee. I am heartily in favor of the Foraker bill and have always been, but this bill is not along that line.

Now, I understand what my friends say about our southern women taking care of our southern graves, and I know they are very jealous about it and very desirous of doing it. But there are certain records that you can not preserve more than a generation unless you have some means of preserving them. This does not say to Congress what it shall do or what this resolution shall do. It is an effort to preserve the history of the Confederate soldiers in the civil war.

If you will listen a minute, you will see that this does not interfere with what is to be done under the Foraker bill. After providing for the appointment of a commission, it says—

That it shall be the duty of said commission to mature and adopt such plan or plans, from examinations already made of the graves of Confederate soldiers, looking to the preservation, protection, and beautifying of the same.

Now, in those cases where they are preserved, why this commission would have nothing to do; but there are certain places where they are not preserved, where, unfortunately, there is nobody to take care of them, and in the interest of and in connection with the sentiment of the southern people to take care of these graves where opportunities have not been given I am pleading to-day. So that is all this amendment amounts to.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to ask if it ever occurred to the gentleman that no such attempt has ever been made on the part of the United States as to make a record of Union soldiers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I must say that when the Union soldiers were being buried right after the war, and national cemeteries made, I was a very young man, and really did not know much about it.

Mr. KEIFER. But this is a proposition to go to the private graveyards and the church cemeteries and all that, throughout the South, and gather up and make up a record, is it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I will say to my friend from Ohio, the object is to appoint a commission and ascertain the facts as to the condition of these graves and report to Congress for its consideration. It does not propose any affirmative action on the part of Congress at this time.

Mr. KEIFER. The record that you propose to make is a record of those buried in private graveyards and private lots; and I wish to suggest to the gentleman that I, with others, will go as far as we have gone in reference to Union soldiers, but I think this amendment, if adopted, would be very unfortunate in its effect upon the measure that the committee, I understand, is reporting.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that it is evident from this amendment that it does not intend to do anything affirmative now, but merely intends to appoint a commission to ascertain the facts and conditions and report them to Congress, so that we can have them, if desired in the future, to legislate intelligently in reference to the matter of preserving the records. It is the record which we wish to preserve, so that in the future Congress can act if it desires, and the Foraker bill does not cover that ground.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am one of the few ex-Confederate soldiers on this floor, and think I know something of southern sentiment along the lines about which we have been talking. While our people gratefully accept the patriotic offer on the part of the Government to care for the graves of Confederate prisoners who are buried in northern graveyards, we neither expect nor desire that anything of the kind shall be done with reference to the graves of our dead who are sleeping in their own soil. Not only do our women feel this way about it, but the living ex-Confederate soldiers themselves and the sons and daughters of the dead feel the same way. I think that the offering of the amendment by the gentleman from Alabama is unfortunate, and I hope that he will withdraw it and not either have it ruled out on a point of order or voted down in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I heartily approve of the Foraker bill, which the committee agreed to report this morning, and when it comes up for discussion on this floor I shall be very glad to raise my voice, if necessary, and give my vote in its favor. I believe that the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons should be properly marked by our Government. The bill which the gentleman from Alabama has offered as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, however, is entirely out of order. The gentleman has made a splendid appeal, a splendid speech for the benefit of his gallant constituents; but the gentleman must know, if he knows anything of legislation, that this is not a proper place to offer such an amendment. [Laughter.] The gentleman knows that you can not legislate in this fashion; that what the gentleman has proposed here is against the rules of the House. I am surprised that my friend from Alabama should expect to have a matter of this kind go through, practically, by unanimous consent. I have no doubt but that his is a proper case, but I say that a matter of this kind should be looked into by a proper committee. When the gentleman's bill is reported to this House in a proper manner from the proper committee, and it comes up for discussion in this House, then

I think will be the proper time to take it up for consideration. I must insist upon the objection I have made. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to the last paragraph on page 44, in order that I may ask the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, to give attention to a matter which I think has escaped his attention.

Mr. HULL. I noticed that. There is only one more paragraph to read; let us read that, and then your request to return to the paragraph will be in order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in protecting and preserving the battlefield of Balls Bluff, in Loudoun County, Va., and the burial place of those killed in that battle. In his discretion and within said appropriation said Secretary of War is authorized to buy so much of said battlefield as he deems proper for the purposes aforesaid. The sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 47, in line 4, after the word "that," insert the words "the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, and."

On page 47, in line 5, strike out the words "sum of $5,000" and insert the word "same."

On page 47, in line 11, strike out the sentence after the word "aforesaid."

Mr. HULL. I ask that the paragraph be read as it will read after the amendment is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, and the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in protecting and preserving the battlefield of Balls Bluff, in Loudoun County, Va., and the burial place of those killed in that battle. In his discretion and within said appropriation said Secretary of War is authorized to buy so much of said battlefield as he deems proper for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to that amendment at all.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That means that only $5,000 will be appropriated?

Mr. HULL. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to return to the last paragraph on page 44, to the title of "Ordnance stores and supplies," for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the item for machinery necessary for the manufacture of equipments for the infantry and cavalry and for ordnance has been stricken out, but that the total amount appropriated remains unchanged, which would operate to leave a surplus in the hands of the Department officer.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "and eighty-five," I will raise no objection.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to strike out, in line 4, page 45, the words "and eighty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment to be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 45, line 4, strike out the words "and eighty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments and with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had directed him to report back to the House the bill (H. R. 14397) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, they will be voted upon in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TARIFF RELATIONS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND GERMANY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the following privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Resolution No. 346.

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to Congress information as to what arrangement or agreement the Department of State has made with the German Government in reference to the tariff relations between the United States and Germany.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the report read so far as it includes the letter from Secretary Root.

The Clerk read as follows:

[House Report No. 1833, to accompany H. Res. 346.]

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred House resolution 346, calling upon the President of the United States for information as to what arrangement or agreement the Department of State has made with the German Government, reports back the resolution with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

The resolution was submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means to the Secretary of State, who replies, under date of February 28 instant, transmitting the entire arrangement or agreement and all papers relating thereto between the United States and the German Government in reference to the subject-matter of the resolution. This correspondence and the papers received from the Secretary of State are made a part of this report, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 28, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. PAYNE: I have your letter of to-day inclosing copy of a resolution introduced in the House yesterday requesting "information as to what arrangement or agreement the Department of State has made with the German Government in reference to tariff relations between the United States and Germany."

Perhaps the simplest treatment of the subject will be to give you the information now. There has been no arrangement or agreement made with the German Government in reference to the tariff relations between the United States and Germany, except as appears in the inclosed correspondence.

The proclamation referred to in my letter of February 19, 1906, continuing the duties of section 3 of the Dingley tariff act has been issued. The amended consular regulations, Nos. 678 and 680, referred to in my letter of February 16, 1906, have been prepared and will probably have been signed by the President by the time your committee meets.

Very sincerely, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

The Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

(Inclosures:) To German ambassador, February 16, 19, 21, and 23, 1906. From German ambassador, February 18, 24, and 26, 1906, with memorandum.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the accompanying papers be printed with the report without reading them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask for the same thing, as I introduced the resolution, and I hope it will not be objected to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The papers are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 16, 1906.

EXCELLENCY: I have received from the Secretary of the Treasury a formulation of the various changes in the Customs Laws and Regulations, to which the Treasury gives its assent, upon the several points as to which you desire changes.

1. You said in your letter of November 21: "It is now almost entirely the rule that the exporter has to appear personally before the American consul in order to get his invoice legalized. Could the rule be made the exception?"

I inclose herewith, marked "A," a proposed amendment of section 678 of our Consular Regulations, which I think accomplishes what you desire.

2. You say: "Would it be possible to have the invoice legalized, at the choice of the exporter, in the district where the goods have been bought or in the district where the importer lives?"

The proposed amendment of regulation 678 above referred to also provides that the invoice may be legalized at the choice of the exporter in the district in which the goods were bought or in the district where they were manufactured. This I understand to be a substantial compliance with your wish.

3. You say: "Could, under certain circumstances, the American consul in making his inquiries about the dutiable value be instructed to cooperate with competent German chambers of commerce?"

I inclose a proposed amendment of Consular Regulation No. 680, making it the duty of consular officers to confer with the German chambers of commerce, and making it their duty also to report the communications which they may receive from such bodies, so that their views and action shall be before the appraising officers in this country. The proposed amended regulation 680 is marked "B."

4. You say: "Could the special agents or commissioners sent by the United States to Germany (special Treasury experts and agents) in order to investigate in cases of special importance the market value be notified to the German Government and in certain cases cooperate with the competent German chambers of commerce?"

I inclose a proposed instruction to the agent of our Treasury Department charged with such matters in Germany which I think will accomplish what you desire. It is marked "C."

5. You say: "Could, in certain cases in which the accuracy of the value declared by the importer had been rendered probable by certificates of German official chambers of commerce, the importer be allowed, if nevertheless the American customs authorities do not accept his declaration, the possibility of defending himself in a more efficient way than he now can? Could the appraisers be instructed to give the motives of their decisions in all cases in which they decide against the certificates of these chambers of commerce?"

I inclose a proposed rule, or order, from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Board of General Appraisers, which requires them to make the hearing in such cases open and in the presence of the importer or his attorneys whenever the public interests will not be prejudiced thereby. It is believed that this will accomplish what you desire as fully as is practicable. It does not seem to be practicable to require a regular trial, as in a court of law, upon every case of appraisement. That would be something unknown to the administration of customs laws anywhere in the world and wholly incapable of practical operation. The whole theory under which our customs laws are administered is that the appraising officer shall reach a conclusion as to the value upon the best information that he can get. The rule now proposed goes as far in the direction of turning this ascertainment of value into a trial as our Treasury thinks it is possible to go. This proposed rule is marked "D."

6. You say: "Could it be arranged that an additional duty be levied only in case the appraised value exceeds the declared value more than 10 per cent?"

This would require Congressional action. I inclose, marked "E," a proposed recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, which applies the rule for which you ask to the extent of 5 per cent, and, as to the remaining 5 per cent, gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to waive or remit the additional duty upon a certificate that the undervaluation was the result of honest difference of opinion—that is to say, under the proposed rule the additional duty would be imposed only in case the appraised value exceeds the declared value more than 5 per cent, and could then be remitted up to the point of a 10 per cent difference upon a certificate of good faith.

7. You say: "Could goods on consignment be treated like goods that have been sold as regards the reexamination of costs of production?"

You will recall that in an interview with Baron Bussche he indicated this was intended to call for an application of section 7 of the customs-administration law, which permits the owner or consignee of purchased merchandise at the time of entry an addition to the cost or value given in the invoice, so as to raise the invoice value to the actual market value or the wholesale price of such merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States. The second paragraph of the proposed recommendation by the Secretary of the Treasury marked "B" contains a further recommendation for the necessary amendment of section 7 to comply with your wish regarding consigned goods.

I beg you to believe, my dear Baron, that in our treatment of all these subjects we have been actuated by a strong desire to comply with the wishes of your Government and to obviate any annoyances or hindrances to German producers and merchants in the conduct of their trade with the United States. We would greatly deplore any interference with that trade, and we are anxious to avoid, so far as it can possibly be done, every occasion for irritation on the part of the persons engaged in it. We sincerely hope that the trade between our countries may continue and increase upon both sides with mutual satisfaction and profit.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

CONSULAR REGULATIONS.

Section 678. Invoices of merchandise purchased for export to the United States must be produced for certification to the consul of the district at which the merchandise was purchased, or in the district in which it was manufactured, but as a rule consular officers shall not require the personal attendance at his office of the shipper, purchaser, manufacturer, owner, or his agent, for the purpose of making declarations to invoices, but he shall certify invoices sent to him through the mails or by messenger. To conform to the statute which requires that merchandise shall be invoiced at the market value or wholesale price of such merchandise as bought and sold in usual wholesale quantities at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country whence imported, consuls will certify to invoices the additional cost of transportation from the place of manufacture to the place of shipment whenever the invoice is presented to be consulated in a country other than the one from which the merchandise is being directly exported to the United States.

CONSULAR REGULATIONS.

680. When the invoice and declaration are received by the consul it is his duty to examine carefully each item and satisfy himself that it is true and correct. In aid of this examination it shall be the duty of such consular officer to confer with official chambers of commerce and other trade organizations in his district, and he shall report any and all written communications from such commercial bodies and trade organizations that may be submitted to him in writing, together with all schedules of prices furnished him officially for that purpose, and the consul is authorized, in his discretion, to call for the bills of sale of merchandise purchased for export to the United States, to inquire into the cost of production of merchandise not obtained by purchase, to demand samples, and, if the conditions require it, to examine the entire consignment. Whenever an invoice is offered for certification which covers consolidated shipments consisting of the productions of different manufacturers, the consul may demand the submission of the manufacturers' bills relating thereto. Even when the merchandise has been purchased for export and the invoice sets out truly the price paid, the consul should ascertain whether the price represents the market value of the goods.

C.

In conducting investigations for purposes of discovering market value or cost of manufacture of merchandise produced within your district, you are directed to confer with chambers of commerce and other trade organizations, and to report to this Department all information you derive from these sources, together with price lists submitted and approved by such organizations.

D.

You are hereby directed that in reappraisement cases pending before a board of three the hearing shall be open and in the presence of the importer or his attorney whenever, in the judgment of the board, the public interest will not be prejudiced thereby.

E.

I beg to recommend the following amendments and modifications of the customs administrative act of June 10, 1890:

1. That section 7 of the customs administrative act of June 10, 1890, be so amended as to permit at the time entry is made such addition to the cost or value given in the invoice of consigned merchandise as, in the opinion of the consignee or his agent, may raise the same to the actual market value or wholesale price thereof the same as is by said act permissible of merchandise actually purchased.

2. I further recommend that section 7 be so amended as to impose no additional duty for undervaluation unless such undervaluation shall equal 5 per cent of the market value of the merchandise, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to remit all additional duty whenever the undervaluation is less than 10 per cent of the value of the imported merchandise, provided the board of general appraisers shall certify that, in its opinion, the undervaluation is the result of good-faith differences of opinion or error.

IMPERIAL GERMAN EMBASSY,
Washington, February 18, 1906.

Mr. SECRETARY: As the American Government has not found it possible to arrive at a decision on my memorandum of November 4 the German Government, fully recognizing the difficulties of the American Government in dealing with the question, is ready to fulfill the desire which has been expressed to me by the President and by yourself, and recommended by me to my Government. The German Government is willing to grant to the United States for a certain period those reduced customs duties which have been fixed by the treaties concluded in 1904 and 1905 between Germany on one side and Belgium, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Roumania, Switzerland, and Servia on the other side. To-day a bill will be introduced in the Reichstag with a view to authorize the Federal Council (Bundesrath) to grant to the United States of America until 30th of June, 1907, these reduced duties. In making this concession the German Government expects that Germany will enjoy after March 1, 1906, the reduced duties of section 3 of the Dingley tariff as heretofore.

May I ask you, Mr. Secretary, to favor me with a written confirmation of this at your earliest convenience?

The German Government further hopes that the existing severity and rigidness of the American customs administration will be lessened, and that during the time granted the negotiations which have been entered into will continue and finally lead to a conclusion satisfactory to both parties.

Believe me, Mr. Secretary, yours, most sincerely,

STERNBURG.

The Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State of the United States.

* * * And also to state that the President will issue a proclamation with regard to section 3 in due time.

The negotiations in the Reichstag will begin on Tuesday next.

Washington, February 19, 1906.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of February 18 advising me that the German Government is willing to grant to the United States for a certain period those reduced customs duties which have been fixed by the treaties of 1904 and 1905 between Germany, Belgium, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Roumania, Switzerland, and Servia, and that a bill is about to be introduced in the Reichstag with a view to authorize the Bundesrath to grant these reduced duties to the United States until June 30, 1907.

I beg to say that upon the accomplishment of the purpose thus stated, by the assurance to the United States of such reduced duties until the 30th of June, 1907, the President will promptly issue the necessary proclamation for assuring to Germany the reduced duties of section 3 of the Dingley tariff, as heretofore.

I hope that the communication which I had the honor of addressing to you Friday, the 16th instant, enumerating certain proposed changes in the customs administrative law and regulations will be regarded by your Government as evidence of the President's strong desire to relieve our customs administration from everything which seems to German exporters to have any feature of severity. I hope also that during the period which, under the proposed action of the German Government, will continue until the 30th of June, 1907, a satisfactory way will be found to establish a permanent basis for the mutual trade of both countries upon terms satisfactory to both. I am sure that there could not be a more sincere and kindly purpose, or more reasonable and open-minded views, than have actuated the representatives of both countries in the treatment of this subject, and I feel great confidence that a continuance of the same attitude on both sides will lead to a conclusion in conformity with the strong desire for real friendship between the German and American peoples which we both entertain.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

MY DEAR BARON: The President authorizes me to say that the regulation marked "C" in the memorandum handed me by you to-day can be modified in accordance with your suggestion by inserting the word "first;" so that it will read:

"In conducting investigations for purposes of discovering market value or cost of manufacture of merchandise produced within your district, you are directed to confer, first, with chambers of commerce and other trade organizations, and to report to this Department all information you derived from these sources, together with price lists submitted and approved by such organizations."

The other memorandum relating to inclusion of the first general appraiser in the provision relating to open hearings has been sent to the Secretary of the Treasury for an expression of opinion by him, and I hope to be able to advise you regarding that to-morrow.

Always faithfully, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

MY DEAR BARON: Regarding the inclusion of the first general appraiser in the provision authorizing open hearing in reappraisement cases, the Secretary of the Treasury says that it can be done if you are specially urgent for it, but he thinks that I ought to say to you that he does not consider it probable that the first general appraiser will consider it practicable to give hearings which will be in the nature of court proceedings, and that he does not think the authority conferred in the new rule would be very much exercised by the first general appraiser—that is to say, he thinks that if the authority were given the appraiser would quite uniformly rule that the public interests would be prejudiced by the open hearing.

Referring to your letter of February 22, I have asked the Secretary of the Treasury to favor me with an expression of his views upon the questions which you asked, and I will communicate with you immediately upon hearing from him.

Very sincerely, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

His Excellency BARON SPECK VON STERNBURG.

[Confidential.]

IMPERIAL GERMAN EMBASSY,
Washington, February 24, 1906.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In reply to your letter of the 23d instant, permit me to say that our people interested in the matter think that the possibility of open hearings before the first general appraiser is essential. They also believe that the first general appraiser will not uniformly rule that the public interests would be prejudiced by the open hearing, if he is left entire discretion in this respect. I therefore would be greatly obliged to you if you would have the proposed modification inserted.

Believe me, Mr. Secretary, very sincerely, yours,

STERNBURG.

The Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State of the United States, Washington.

IMPERIAL GERMAN EMBASSY,
Washington, February 26, 1906.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Permit me, in connection with my statements of this morning, to inclose a memorandum explaining the status of our new customs law. Could I ask you to be so kind as to send me a short notice of the date on which the proclamation of the President regarding section 3 of the Dingley tariff will be issued?

Believe me, Mr. Secretary, most sincerely, yours,

STERNBURG.

The Hon. ELIHU ROOT,

MEMORANDUM.—The bill has come before the Bundesrath and will immediately be submitted to the Emperor for signature. In the meantime the Bundesrath has made use of the power conferred upon this body, and decided on Saturday last to grant, until further notice, to the products of the United States the rates of the German conventional tariff without setting a term within the fixed time. As soon as the act has received the signature of His Majesty it will be published, together with the resolution of the Bundesrath.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MARKING GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1234) to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the locations and condition of all the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy in the late civil war, 1861 to 1865, who died in Federal prisons and military hospitals in the North and who were buried near their places of confinement with power, in his discretion, to acquire possession or control over all grounds where said prison dead are buried not now possessed or under the control of the United States Government; to cause to be prepared accurate registers in triplicate, one for the superintendent's office in the cemetery, one for the Quartermaster-General's Office, and one for the War Records Office, Confederate archives, of the places of burial, the number of the grave, the name, company, regiment, or vessel and State, of each Confederate soldier and sailor who so died, by verification with the Confederate archives in the War Department at Washington, D. C.; to cause to be erected over said graves white marble headstones similar to those recently placed over the graves in the "Confederate section" in the national cemetery at Arlington, Va., similarly inscribed; to build proper fencing for the preservation of said burial grounds, and to care for said burial grounds in all proper respects not herein specifically mentioned; the said work to be completed within two years, at the end of which a report of the same shall be made to Congress.

That for the carrying out of the objects set forth herein there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to appoint some competent person as commissioner to ascertain the location of such Confederate graves not heretofore located, and to compare the names of those already marked with the registers in the cemeteries, and correct the same when found necessary, as preliminary to the work of marking the graves with suitable headstones, and to fix the compensation of said commissioner, at the rate not to exceed $2,500 per annum, who shall be allowed necessary traveling expenses.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. We have in Chicago the Confederate mound in Oakwood Cemetery, a plat of ground under the care of the Government, in which 4,000 Confederate soldiers are buried who died at Camp Douglass. The Government has undertaken to care for the ground under a bill which I introduced in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and an annual appropriation of $250 is made for the care of it. A Confederate association has erected upon this ground a large monument. The ground stands in the middle of Oakwood Cemetery. It has no fence around it; it is not possible to ascertain the names of all the soldiers buried there, but to put a fence around it, to put up marble slabs on the ground would simply be to disfigure what is now probably one of the most beautiful resting places to be found in this country.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman whether, under this bill, the Secretary of War will be required to walk into this beautiful cemetery, into this ground where these soldiers are buried, and put up a lot of little dinky slabs around this beautiful monument and then put a fence around it?

Mr. PRINCE. In answer to the gentleman I will say that I do not think he would be compelled to do it. If the graves of the dead are so sufficiently marked to satisfy those that are interested in the marking of the graves, I see no necessity for his going there and putting up those markers.

Mr. MANN. That will depend upon the terms of the bill. Of course these graves are not marked at all. There is a plot of ground, and there is no possibility of marking the graves except that they could put up a lot of marble slabs purporting to mark the graves. The graves themselves are beyond marking. The ground has been raised, it is grassed over, trees have been planted on it by the Government, and it has been put in a perfectly beautiful condition. Now, will this bill require the Secretary of War to ruin this piece of ground?

Mr. PRINCE. I should say not.

Mr. PAYNE. Why not put in a proviso that it shall not apply to this cemetery?

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that might be well.

Mr. PRINCE. I am frank to say if the gentleman will submit an amendment or proviso that I will have no objection to it. I do not think there is any necessity for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He can not mark the graves if he does not know where the graves are.

Mr. MANN. I apprehend he will find that condition of affairs at most of the graves, but that they will mark the graves there in regular order in their places, whether they find the actual graves or not. It is true, I suppose, in all of the camp prisons, as it was there that trenches were dug in which a large number of these soldiers were buried. There is no way of ascertaining where these men are individually buried. Of course, in many places it would look better to put up a headstone or a footstone in the semblance of ascertaining the exact places, but I do not want a bill passed, if I can help it, which will spoil what is certainly now the most beautiful resting place for the Confederate dead in the North.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If we could insert in the bill the words "where practicable," I think it would be satisfactory.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why not put in a proviso that the provisions of this bill shall not apply to that cemetery.

Mr. MANN. Why can not the gentleman tell me the place to put in a proviso that the provisions of this bill shall not apply to the Confederate mound in Oakwood Cemetery, Chicago?

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me to suggest, the same condition, in some degree, exists at Columbus, Ohio, and other places, I presume, and it better be made general.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I hope that will not be done.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the Confederate mound in Oakwood Cemetery is the only place that is now actually cared for by the Government in the North where the Confederate dead are buried.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; there are some out here at Arlington. Certainly the Secretary of War can be trusted in a matter of this kind.

Mr. KEIFER. If he is given discretion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He is given that discretion.

Mr. MANN. If he is given the discretion, I am satisfied. Why not put in the words "in his discretion."

Mr. PRINCE. It is impossible to mark anything where there is not anything.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest an amendment, at the end of line 16, on page 2, to add the following:

Provided, That as to cemeteries already under Government care the fence and markers may be omitted.

Mr. MANN. That satisfies me.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to any amendment made to this bill. It has been perfected now exactly as the people in interest want it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will yield a moment, I desire to suggest that wherever it can not be ascertained that a soldier has been buried, wherever his grave can not be identified, there will be no possibility even of there being a marking of the grave. Wherever it can be identified, we do not care where it is; if a particular Confederate soldier can be ascertained to have been buried in that particular place, we want it marked. Now, as far as the situation described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is concerned, there seems to be no possibility of identifying a grave, and, of course, it would be a matter of barbarity to erect headstones on guesswork, and nobody would attempt it—certainly not this Confederate commission; but if they could find that a certain Confederate soldier of a certain company and regiment is buried in a particular spot, they desire to mark it, and where they can not ascertain it, of course they will not mark it.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman would not contend, I suppose, that if the Confederate mound were not now being taken care of this bill would not apply to the case?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, it could not apply——

Mr. MANN. Because it is a futile proceeding for Congress to pass a bill upon this subject if it does not propose to actually take care of the resting place of these soldiers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It must first "ascertain" in order to "mark." Where it can not ascertain it can not mark.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to make this suggestion? I have the original bill in my hand, and I have no objection to it, and I am anxious that it should pass, as its friends in the South desire it, but I suggest that in line 8, where it reads "to cause to be erected over said graves white marble headstones," that after the word "erect" I would put in the words "where practicable," adding nothing more, but putting those two words in there, so it would read:

To cause to be erected where practicable over said graves white marble headstones similar to those, etc.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, could they be erected if it was not practicable?

Mr. KEIFER. It requires it emphatically here, so they might have to put them where they ought not to be put.

Mr. MANN. We do not want headstones in the Confederate mound; we do not want a fence around it. It would offend every Confederate soldier who came to Chicago and visited this place, and I presume more have gone to that graveyard there than to any graveyard in the North. This is now in a most beautiful spot, and it is cared for under an annual appropriation.

Mr. HULL. Is not this true, Mr. Speaker: It is under the direction of a Confederate, and it is not expected to take charge of a place like the Chicago cemetery that is provided for by law now, and where the mound has been cared for and so much appropriated annually for its care? Therefore how can this bill interfere with it? My objection to commencing to interfere with the bill by amendment is this, that it has been gone over carefully by the committee and it has been carefully considered by General Lee——

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend for a moment? If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the House a Senate bill with House amendments disagreed to, so that it may go to conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution 37, extending the tribal existence and government of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to insist upon the House amendments and agree to a conference upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House do insist upon its amendments and agree to a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

MARKING GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I was just saying this bill has been carefully considered, not only by the committees of the Senate and the House, but it was prepared by General Lee and the good women of the South. This bill places the responsibility on the ex-Confederate commissioner. There is nothing, in my mind, that would justify going into general amendments by the House. The cemetery at Chicago is already fixed. A Confederate, a man who holds in as tender reverence the dead of the Confederacy as anyone can, will be appointed to look after this matter, so it is in the hands of friends; and to assume even that he will so act as to desecrate a grave is something that, to my mind, is a violent assumption, and I did hope, after we had reported it, after we had had full conference with the Daughters of the Confederacy and with representative generals of the Confederacy this morning, that we would pass the bill as it was reported and as they expect it will be passed, and it will save explanation if we do so. In my judgment, no harm will come to any cemetery now cared for by the Government, and parties directly interested will be happy.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say I have the honor of having Gen. Stephen D. Lee as one of my constituents, and I have had considerable correspondence with reference to this bill, and I know that the Foraker bill, and I understand this is the same, meets his absolute approval, and he desires this to pass without amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I had felt that this bill would interfere with the Confederate mound at Chicago I probably should have raised an objection to the consideration of the bill until it were properly amended. I do not ask that the bill be amended. I asked in the first place, hoping that there might be a response that this bill would not affect the situation there. Apparently the bill is directory upon the War Department, but all I ask now is that if it be found that the War Department believes that under the bill it is compelled to enter upon the Confederate mound at the Oakwood Cemetery and put up gravestones there not wanted, and a fence that would be a desecration, this House and Congress will promptly meet the appeal of the ex-Confederates of Chicago and amend the law so that it will not apply to that place.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. PRINCE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Suppose we pass the bill now as it is. There are two or more amendments to the Senate bill. Should the bill now be passed, then it will come upon the question of concurring by the Senate. And all of us who appreciate the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will see to it that the objection or suggestion of the gentleman is made in the Senate or in the conference, as the case may be.

Mr. MANN. I appreciate fully the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], which, like all of his suggestions, is very bright; but the truth is, I have all I can do trying to look after my work at this end of the Capitol without attending to the other end. I appreciate the suggestion, however, and may act on it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the committee amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, in line 9, after the word "confinement," insert "with power, in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I think I have the floor. If it is proper now to discuss the bill, I want to yield some time——

Mr. KEIFER. Let us pass the bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. Pass it, and then discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] has the floor.

The question is on the passage of the bill as amended.

The question was taken, and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PRINCE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 297. An act to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama; and

H. R. 13308. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4482. An act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. OTJEN, for four days, on account of important business.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of deficiency appropriation for coal and transportation, Bureau of Equipment—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to the inquiry of the House, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office as to the conduct of the land office at Kingfisher, Okla.—to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15744) to abolish the office of Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1825); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. McLAIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3541) granting a pension to Dora Weathersby, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1796); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4598) granting an increase of pension to James B. Barry, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1797); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5725) granting an increase of pension to John G. Davis, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1798); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5726) granting an increase of pension to Cate E. Cobb, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1799); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

The report was agreed to.

GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE DEAD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1234) to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were buried near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes, which was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "confinement," to insert "with power in his discretion."

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 14397. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee in section 13.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin, if in order, I ask that section 13 be passed over for the present and that we take up for consideration section 19, which was also laid over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, section 13 will be passed over for the present.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the chairman to let me suggest a couple of brief amendments. In section 2, page 2, line 16, after the word "members," I move to insert "or freedmen."

Mr. CLAPP. I will agree to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, amend the committee amendment as agreed to yesterday by adding after the word "members" the words "or freedmen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. On page 25, line 3, after the word "him," I move to strike out "forty" and insert "one hundred and sixty."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment agreed to yesterday by striking out the word "forty," before "acres," in line 3, and inserting "one hundred and sixty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Since I made the suggestion that we pass over section 13 and proceed to section 19 I observe that the junior Senator from Wisconsin has entered the Chamber. Perhaps we may as well now continue the consideration of section 13.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee in section 13.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, at the close of the session last evening I had offered a letter received from a resident of the Territory and sent it to the desk. By an oversight it was not read. I ask to have it read now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

LAWTON, OKLA., February 22, 1906.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,

DEAR SIR: The coal lands of the Indian Territory are worth many millions and the Indians should have the uttermost farthing of their actual value. The surface overlying some of the best mines is worth from twenty-five to fifty dollars per acre for agricultural purposes alone. This is especially true in the Lehigh vicinity. My recollection is that the annual output of these mines is worth much more than the $6 per acre appraisement. Boone Williams, of Lehigh, Ind. T., could give you full and particular information upon the foregoing points. Would it not be well for Congress to pass a joint resolution providing that railroads in the Territories should not own more land than was necessary to conduct their business and should not engage in any other business than that of common carriers? Allow me to direct your attention to freight-rate conditions in the two Territories. The Congressional acts chartering the railroads which run through Oklahoma and the Indian Territory provide that they shall not charge higher freight rates than those charged in Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas. This is, of course, an indeterminate standard, but no effort has been made either to observe it or to enforce it. The law had no sanction and no penalty and no one was charged with its execution. The railroads have run riot, with no one to say them nay. Permit one or two instances: They refused to furnish cars. The farmers this season have ordered twenty-five hundred cars of coal. A majority of the mines refused to sell them coal, and the railroads refused to haul them coal unless they would join the coal trust. As much as twelve hundred dollars, which had been paid in advance for coal, was refunded to the farmers by the mine operators. The Santa Fe road, as I am advised, refuses to receive cars from the Rock Island road, thus necessitating unloading and reloading at junction points.

The rate on wheat from Aline, Okla., to Oklahoma City, a distance of about 100 miles, is 26 cents per hundred, whereas the rate from Aline via Oklahoma City, a distance of 496 miles farther, is also 26 cents. The rate on cotton seed from Indianola to Crowder City, Ind. T., a distance of 9 miles, is 14 cents, while the rate from Indianola via Crowder City to Fort Smith, about 90 miles, is only 6 cents. Those are the rates when I was last advised. The rates on all points in the two Territories which are near enough to the Texas line to secure competitive rates with Texas points are from 25 per cent to 60 per cent lower than from other points in the Territories which are not so situated. This applies, of course, to shipments to Galveston and points in Texas.

We have the same systems of roads and same character of traffic as the State of Texas. If self-government should again be denied us, which seems at least probable, a railroad commission, modeled after the Texas plan, appointed by the President and invested with jurisdiction over the two Territories, would be an infinite blessing to the people of the two Territories.

Kindly consider such a measure in the event our hopes for statehood should again be deferred.

Believe me, sir, very truly, yours, T. P. GORE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have very little to add to what I said yesterday in support of the pending amendment. Some Senators have said to me personally that the amendment goes too far; that it is quite right to bar railroads from ownership in coal which they transport in competition with other producers who must use their lines of road, but that the proposition which would exclude the officials of railway companies and their stockholders from owning and operating such coal mines is too extreme, too radical.

Mr. President, legislation to be of any value to the people of this country must be practical. It must meet the existing conditions. Of what avail is it to enact a statute barring railroad companies from becoming competitors in production with those who are producing and transporting over their lines if the railway companies are permitted to accomplish exactly the same thing through their officers and stockholders?

That situation is particularly emphasized by the letter which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] had read on this floor, written by the governor of West Virginia, to which I made reference last evening. He said it makes little difference whether the railroad company competes over its own lines with producers who must ship over those lines or whether the controlling stockholders and officers of the railroad engage in the business as competitors. To enact a statute barring the railroad companies, and stop there, is to give husks instead of the kernel of practical legislation to the interests that are crying out for protection.

Many years ago, in the State of Pennsylvania, the anthracite coal fields were in a measure taken possession of by certain railroad companies that built into those fields. Those railroad lines furnished the only highways over which that coal could go to market. The lines at that time were largely owned by individuals and private corporations. What transpired? The owners of these highways over which the coal had to be shipped to market were able, by a combination or understanding, to push the freight rates up on the individual owners and operators, denying them equal facilities and equal rates in reaching the markets with their coal. The State of Pennsylvania adopted a constitutional amendment in 1873, prohibiting any railroad company from owning lands in that State either for mining or manufacturing purposes, providing that they might own such lands as were necessary for the conduct of their business as common carriers.

But there was no provision in the Constitution that the officers and stockholders of those roads might not organize companies and take possession of coal lands for mining purposes. As a result these railroad companies and those who represent them have driven the independent operators and owners out of business. To-day companies organized by the officials and stockholders of these railroads control 98 per cent of the anthracite coal of Pennsylvania.

What does that mean, Mr. President? It means this: There are three anthracite coal fields in this country so far as present discovery discloses. Upon those anthracite fields the people of the United States are dependent for coal to warm their homes. If you could bring those three coal fields together into one body it would make a little patch of country 8 miles by 60; or, to be perfectly accurate, 8 by 62½ miles.

The people of Pennsylvania and the people of this country have slept while 98 per cent of all that precious product has been taken possession of and is under the control practically of eight railway companies in Pennsylvania. For that reason I have incorporated in this amendment the proposition that not only the railroad company shall be barred from acquiring title to this land, but that the deeds when executed shall contain a provision against the officials and the stockholders of the companies becoming the owners of these coal lands.

It may be said here, Mr. President, as it was said in the Committee on Indian Affairs when I offered the amendment, that if the railroad companies want these coal lands they will get them. But I desire to record here my protest against the doctrine, that now or at any time in the history of this country it shall ever be said that the railroad companies can secure the mastery and control the ownership of any of the natural products of this country. In other words, to put it a little differently, I believe that this Government, however it may have appeared in recent years to the contrary, is stronger than any of its creatures; that this Government is stronger than all the railroads of this country in aggregation, stronger than all of the centralized power of this country represented in unlawful combinations and trusts.

So, Mr. President, I venture to ask Senators to support the amendment which I have offered here and to write into the statute books of the United States that railway companies shall be common carriers and nothing else, and to so write it as to make it effective.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I simply desire to say in regard to this amendment that much which has been said would undoubtedly be of force if we were at this time dealing with that question, which is now pending before the Senate and which must be dealt with in the very near fuaure.

The question of this amendment substantially was before the committee for its consideration. The committee felt, in the first place, that these lands being the lands of Indian tribes it was our duty to safeguard as far as possible to them the highest possible price that could be secured for the land, and we echoed the sentiment contained in the letter read this morning that it was our duty to secure for them the last farthing possible to be obtained in the sale of the lands.

We felt that in trusting this matter to the President and Secretary, the less limitations there were thrown around the sale of the lands the more they would bring when the time came to dispose of them.

If this bill ever passes it will contain a clause postponing the sale of these lands, under the present terms at least, until 1911, during which time there will be abundant opportunity to consider these questions. But there was no reason that impelled the committee——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I should like to ask the Senator the reason why this legislation should be enacted now.

Mr. CLAPP. I am just going to reach that in a moment.

Mr. LONG. Considering the fact that the Senate has already adopted an amendment postponing the sale until 1911.

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I just stated to the Senate, and I thought I was using voice enough so that it might be heard throughout the Chamber. I will say again that as the bill now stands it contains a prohibition against the sale of this property prior to 1911.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator understood me. What is the necessity of providing for the lands at all if they can not be sold until 1911? Why not reject the amendment proposed by the committee and restore the House provision that reserves the lands from sale?

Mr. CLAPP. I stated the other day that, so far as the chairman was concerned, he was perfectly agreeable to strike out all of section 13. But that does not seem to this point to have been the prevailing sentiment of the Senate. So I am discussing the question from the standpoint of the possible adoption of section 13, as reported by the committee, subject to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

There were two other reasons why we did not feel it incumbent upon us to interfere in this matter. In the first place, if that country is admitted as a State, then, as to intrastate traffic, it will be the subject of State control and legislation. As to interstate traffic, it will remain the subject of Federal legislation. There is pending to-day in Congress, pending in this very Chamber, under consideration by the Chamber, a resolution broadly designed to reach the very question covered by the proposed amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. The Committee on Indian Affairs felt that it would be an usurpation on their part, in view of the pending legislation in Congress, to take this matter into their own hands, even as to that one Territory, and for that reason the committee rejected the proposition which is practically embodied in the proposed amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word. I am in sympathy with the general purpose expressed in the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and I think I would be safe in saying that every member of the Commitee on Indian Affairs accords in that view. The only things which deterred the committee, and which would deter me now, from voting for the amendment is the one stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the chairman of the committee, that this limitation upon the purchasers might result in a loss, a large loss, to the Indians, and because the amendment in its present form might be held to be subject to constitutional objections.

These are not public lands. They do not belong to the United States. The United States holds them in trust for the benefit of these Indians, and holds them under solemn pledges contained in treaties entered into between the United States and these several tribes. I am not sure—indeed, I am far from being sure—whether a greater sum in the aggregate would be received from the sale of these lands with this amendment incorporated in the law or with it out.

I was impressed by the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin, that if the railroads carrying this coal to market are to own it in any large quantity, outside and independent purchasers would be deterred from investing in the lands on the apprehension that the carrier would deny to them equality of rates and opportunities in reaching the market. There is force in that suggestion. It simply increases the difficulty, in my mind, as to the action that Congress ought to take if the lands are to be sold. It is because of the enormous value of the property, the great interest involved in it, and of the influences which are operating and will operate to obtain the control and ownership of these valuable concessions that I on yesterday offered the amendment to postpone the date of the sale for five years, and I am inclined now to follow the leadership of the chairman of the committee and vote to disagree to the committee amendment proposed to the House bill, leaving it where the House bill left it, and let the lands be only leased. One hundred and seven thousand acres of them have already been leased, and something near half of that great area is now under lease to and is operated by railroad companies—at least that is my information. The remaining three hundred and odd thousand acres can well be left where it is for years, if it is anything like as valuable as the leased and developed lands have proven to be. I believe it would be the part of high wisdom to do that, not to sell the lands, and I doubt whether they ought to be leased for some time to come.

I believe it would be well to insert a clause in the House bill forbidding the sale or lease of those lands for at least two or three years. I know the argument is that that would tend to create a monopoly in those who already have leases; but, Mr. President, the companies who are now operating will hold in practical effect that monopoly anyway for the next two or three years. The lands can not be leased and capital obtained to develop them immediately, and, in order that Congress may have an opportunity to better understand that situation through some agency which Congress may appoint, I believe it would be well to defer any conveyance, limited or unlimited, to the remaining lands.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] yesterday to appoint a committee to visit the Indian Territory during the vacation and look into this question, to thoroughly examine and report such facts and bring such information to the Senate as will enable it to act intelligently, ought to be adopted, and until Congress can receive that information I do not believe any disposition whatever should be made of these lands.

This entire section in its present form, and, of course, all amendments to it, should be kept out of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think that there is a very strong feeling here that we had better first dispose of the thirteenth section of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the section which is now before the Senate, and the pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that, Mr. President, but I wanted to suggest that possibly we could save time by first disposing of the question whether we wished to enact section 13 as amended or otherwise. I believe if a vote were taken on it that the thirteenth section would be voted out; in other words, that the House provision would be left in the bill. I do not, however, know just what the parliamentary situation is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it is necessary to first perfect the section, and that then the question will be upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I suppose technically, perhaps, the amendment to the amendment will have to be voted on if the Senator who offers it insists on that; but that will necessitate some debate.

Mr. President, I am in full sympathy with every effort which is made to prevent a railroad from engaging in any business except the business for which it is supposed ordinarily to be organized—that is, for transportation purposes.

My education in the law would lead me to suppose that, unless a railroad company was specifically and specially authorized by its charter or by some act of the legislature chartering it, or under which it was chartered, transportation is its only purpose, and that, unless so provided in its charter legally and properly, if it should engage in other business everything beyond transportation would be ultra vires and without authority. The Supreme Court of the United States within a few days has, I think, practically settled that question and has covered the very thing now complained of as possible and probable, namely, that these railroads will become the miners of coal or, in other words, that they will become miners and not transporters, by saying that this did not enable them to escape the provisions of the interstate-commerce law. So it seems to me that the fear that these particular lands will pass into the hands of the railroads is rather unnecessarily indulged in. Ordinarily, we should think it a very unusual thing to say that a stockholder of a railroad company could not buy property in a mine or an enterprise of any kind established for a distinct and different purpose from that of transportation. It is very possible that there may be such power, but, Mr. President, I do not believe it is necessary that we should attempt to exercise that power either in the Indian Territory or anywhere else. I have no doubt we could say that a railroad company itself should not do that, because it is organized for a different purpose, but a man who buys stock in a railroad company stands on entirely different ground from that. Possibly we might prohibit the officers of a railroad from doing so, and it is said that, unless we do that, we might as well not prohibit the railroads from purchasing, because they have a method now of organizing companies within companies, consisting of the officials of the railroads, and then those officials become really the trustees of the railroad.

Mr. President, because there is an evil it does not necessarily follow that we are bound to attack it in a way that will raise difficult questions of law and difficult questions as to our rights, and which may establish precedents which will hereafter return to plague us.

A few years ago we had an anthracite coal strike all over the country, and the people in every section felt the injurious influence of that strike. There were all sorts of suggestions to escape from the sufferings and the burdens which were put upon the people; more particularly those who were using anthracite coal. Then, Mr. President, we heard for the first time the most astonishing proposition ever heard of in this country, and that was that the United States might take charge of the anthracite coal business. Everybody admitted that there was an evil for which a remedy should be found, but I think there would be very few members of this body who would be willing to see the United States Government take charge of the anthracite coal business. If it could take charge of the anthracite coal business, it could take charge of the bituminous coal business, and if it could take charge of that it could take charge of every other industry in this country in which the people were interested; yet so conservative a body as the Massachusetts legislature, Mr. President, passed resolutions in favor of the Government of the United States taking charge of the anthracite coal business of the United States. When there is a great wrong being done to the people, there is great danger that we shall, in our anxiety to save the people from that wrong, take steps and do things that are not justifiable. If we take a step of that kind in one serious case, we will take it the next time when the case is not half so serious. This question can be met by this body, not by saying that no one shall buy this coal land, but by providing that a railroad company shall not mine coal.

If you put an incumbrance of that kind upon this land, you are depriving the proper owners of it, who are the Indians of the Indian Territory, of the value of their property. No one would go and buy that property to-day if he knew that when he came to look for the purchaser he must find a man who did not own stock in a railroad company. You would eliminate from the purchasers a very large percentage of the men in the United States who are able to buy coal lands.

If there were no other remedy possible, we might resort to an extreme remedy, but the remedy is in our hands. We can do it in this bill now before the Senate; we can do it in a bill that is to come here for our active consideration in a few days, or, rather, which has been here for at least two days being considered.

We want to give these Indians all that they can get out of that land. We have held it in trust; we still hold it in trust; and I believe it is the duty of the trustee of a trust to make the best possible use and get the greatest income possible out of the wards' property.

I admit the wrong being done in that Territory by these railroad companies owning coal lands. I admit the wrong now being done to the Indians and to the white men. It is a wrong that should not be allowed to continue, but, in my judgment, this is not the remedy. There is a remedy in our hands ample and sufficient, under the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States, by which we can prevent this abuse from being further continued and, at the same time, not prevent it at the expense of our wards.

For that reason, Mr. President, while I am in sympathy with controlling the railroads and keeping them to the business which they were originally intended to follow, I am going to vote against this amendment, and when the opportunity is presented I mean to vote to strike out the amendment to the thirteenth section and to let it stand as it came from the House, unless it is thought best to strike out that provision also when the committee shall consider the question more carefully.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I believe the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is open to amendment now, is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MALLORY. I have very little to say on the subject. I indorse the principle of the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am under the impression that the Senator from Florida can offer an amendment to this amendment, can he not?

Mr. MALLORY. There has been no amendment offered to it, so far as I am aware.

Mr. SPOONER. But the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is an amendment to the Senate committee amendment, which is an amendment to the House bill.

Mr. TELLER. Oh!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Florida would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. TELLER. I was not aware of that.

Mr. BACON. If I may be pardoned, I wish to suggest to the Chair a consideration which may lead the Chair to a different conclusion. I feel quite confident in my mind that the rule as stated by the Chair is not correct, and a slight illustration, I think, will show the reason for that. The general rule is an undoubted one that only two amendments can be pending at the same time; but that means two substantive amendments to the same proposition. In other words, if the Chair will pardon me, there can not be another amendment offered to this amendment of the committee. That would be a violation of the rule, because the pending amendment is a distinct matter, which must be disposed of.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator to pardon me for a moment. I am just trying to get the attention of the Chair, because I am speaking for the purpose of presenting my view. I may be in error, but it is certainly the purpose of the rule to enable the body to perfect any measure. It would be perfectly apparent that, if the rule as stated by the Chair is correct, it would be impossible to perfect the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes an amendment, and, while another amendment to a different part of the amendment of the committee would not be in order, an amendment which is designed to perfect the pending amendment is always in order—necessarily so; otherwise it could not be perfected.

Mr. LODGE. It is never in order.

Mr. BACON. Senators disagree with me, but I will ask that they hear me before they come to that conclusion.

Mr. LODGE. Not under general parliamentary law, or any law I ever heard of.

Mr. BACON. Here is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. Senators might be willing to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin if it were perfected, but would be unwilling to vote for it in its present shape. If the rule stated by the Chair is correct, there is nothing to do but to vote upon this amendment as it stands—either to accept it or reject it as it stands—and the purpose of the rule is defeated.

The distinction is very clear between the purpose of the rule in prohibiting the pendency of two amendments and the purpose of the rule in providing a means by which no amendment may be perfected. I may be in error, but I have not the slightest doubt in the world as to the correctness of that statement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not suppose there was any rule better settled than the rule that there can not be an amendment beyond the second degree. As I understand, the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is an amendment to an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Then no other amendment can be offered until that amendment is disposed of. If the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin be adopted, then the original amendment will be open to perfection and to further amendment; if it be rejected, the occasion for perfecting it does not arise. But I do not believe, under general parliamentary law or any law, anything is better settled than that no amendment can be entertained in the third degree.

Mr. MALLORY. Is it in order for me to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to this amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One moment, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to know what the amendment is.

Mr. MALLORY. It simply strikes out the word "stockholder."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. MALLORY. I merely desire to say that I should like very much to vote for the principle embodied in the remarks made by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] this morning, and I would vote for his amendment were it possible to eliminate the word "stockholder" from the provision of the amendment. But I can not see, in the first place, what right Congress has to put such an inhibition on the individual citizen of the United States. I question very much, Mr. President, whether we have the legal right to do so; and, in the second place, if we had the right, I do not think it would be good policy for us to exercise it. I do not well see how it is possible for a stockholder who may be residing 500 or a thousand miles away from the railroad to work any injustice to the public interests by being interested in coal lands along the line of road. I can readily understand and appreciate the danger of permitting railroads to own these coal lands or permitting directors or officers of railroads to have anything to do with them, but, so far as the stockholder is concerned, it strikes me that we are going a little beyond our legitimate province, and I question very much whether the courts would sustain the action of Congress, if we were to take such action. Therefore I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment; otherwise I should very gladly vote for it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, like the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], I am in favor of the general principle involved in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]; but there are two matters in the amendment as offered by him to which I desire to call his attention and to ask an expression of his views for the benefit of the Senate upon those two propositions.

In the first place, the amendment provides that no railroad company shall acquire any right, title, or interest whatsoever in any of the coal or asphalt lands to be disposed of.

I understand the real substantial objection to the ownership of coal lands by railroad companies is in so far as they will use the product of the mines in competition with a like article in private or other company ownership; but I know of no reason why a railroad company should not own coal lands and supply its lines with the necessary coal for the operation of the road. I know that it is quite usual for railway companies who are not engaged in the sale of coal or the mining of coal for commercial uses to own coal lands which they operate to secure coal with which to perform the labors and the obligations of the road—to run their locomotives, to supply their great machine shops, and for many other uses required of a railway company in the proper operation of its road. Therefore I would ask the Senator from Wisconsin what objection he could have to so changing the first clause of his amendment so that it would read as follows:

Provided, That no railroad company shall acquire any right, title, or interest in said coal and asphalt lands by purchase at said sale except—

This is the addition I would suggest—except to supply the said railroad with coal necessary for its operation.

In other words, to allow a railroad company to purchase a portion of these coal lands, but the lands purchased to be used exclusively and solely by the railroad company for the operation of the road.

Mr. SPOONER. You would have to keep a watchman there.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; I think not. I think there is a sufficient number of private dealers to see that a right of this kind is in no way abused. I have an idea if a railway company owned coal lands to be worked by it for the coal with which to operate its road, that just so soon as it would attempt to put any of that coal upon the market there would be enough individuals and companies interested in suppressing that illegal traffic to call the attention either of the court or the railway commission to the violation of the law.

Then again, like the Senator from Florida, I doubt the wisdom of the prohibition of a man who happens to own stock in a railway company having any interest whatever in any coal lands that are part of coal lands that would be disposed of under this bill. The principle is right, and the theory upon which his amendment is framed is that if a sufficient number of stockholders or officers of a railway company own coal lands in proximity to the road, they may, without the railroad as a corporation being directly interested in it, so control the digging of coal and the sale of coal as to control not only the price of coal, but the cost of labor in connection with the operation of the mines and also to use such coal for the purpose of driving private owners out of business.

But here is a dilemma into which the stockholders in railways might be thrown by this provision: I am a stockholder in a railway at the present time. These lands are to be sold. I would be prohibited from purchasing; but I am not a stockholder in the railway and I purchase some of these lands. In the future I may become a stockholder in the railway. I would have a perfect right to purchase stock upon the market or in any other way. Then what is to become of my stock in the railway company, or what is to become of my interest in the land? If the evil could be avoided by prohibiting present stockholders from acquiring interests in such coal lands, well and good; but that is only for the present and immediate period. A year from now those who would be stockholders, who would become stockholders subsequent to the sale, see fit to purchase an interest in these coal lands. If they have a right so to purchase such interest then the law might readily be avoided by stockholders selling their stock, then purchasing an interest in the land, then again becoming owners of the stock, and thus stockholders might be able to control great areas of these coal lands.

I think the Senator from Wisconsin will hardly contend that a law that would be a valid law could be enacted that would prohibit a person who acquires stock in one of the railroads from subsequently purchasing these coal lands or interests in them, or that would prohibit those who would purchase coal lands at this sale from subsequently purchasing stock in the railroad companies.

The evil that is intended to be reached can not be reached by the provision of the amendment I am now criticising, and it is for that reason I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, in order that those who are in sympathy with the general provisions and the general principle of this amendment may vote for it, that he agree it may be amended in ways that are reasonable, so it will not contain provisions that will necessarily be inoperative or that must be declared illegal when they come before the court.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am quite in sympathy with the purpose intended to be accomplished by the Senator from Wisconsin regarding this matter, but I take the same view as the Senator from Colorado regarding the ownership of the coal lands by stockholders or officers of any railroad company or corporation.

It seems to me we will have advanced quite a way in the direction of curbing and restraining monopolies if we adopt that provision of the amendment which declares that no one shall acquire any interest whatever in these coal and asphalt lands exceeding 3,000 acres, and if any corporation or individual does secure more than 3,000 acres the title shall then revert to the United States to be held in trust for the tribes of Indians.

I understand there are about 450,000 acres of coal land, and if we secure at least 150 competing companies in that coal field, whether the stockholders of those companies be the stockholders and officers of railroad companies or otherwise, we will have advanced a great way in the direction of curbing monopoly.

We are always met with the insufficiency of any legislation that is intended to restrain this great evil. The senior Senator from Colorado insists upon it that while he is in sympathy with the purpose of the Senator from Wisconsin he does not think it should be accomplished in any way by that amendment, but by general legislation upon the subject restraining common carriers generally from owning and operating coal fields. Even in that legislation we will have a difficulty, because it is a question as to how far we can control a purely State corporation that is authorized by its charter to own coal lands or is authorized by its charter to own stock in companies operating coal fields. We all know the Reading Company is a company of that form. It is a corporation organized under the laws of Pennsylvania, engaged in running a railroad and at the same time engaged in operating large coal fields. I do not know whether it owns these coal fields directly or whether it owns them through the agency of subsidiary corporations, the stock of which is owned by the Reading Company, but here we have a corporation directly or indirectly authorized by the sovereignty which created it to own and operate coal mines and the question is, How can we control such a State corporation?

I presume it will be claimed we can control it as far as its interstate business is concerned. We could perhaps prevent it from transporting to another State the coal which it produces, but it seems to me a very serious question as to whether we could strike down the power to own and operate coal mines conferred upon it by the sovereignty which created it.

Throughout the entire country we will find these coal fields are being gradually monopolized either by railroads or by those interested in railroads, and that the coal fields which are owned by those who are not interested in railroads as stockholders or controllers of railroads have no chance whatever in the competition of commerce. For instance, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company controls a large portion of the coal fields of West Virginia, and it is complained that the coal fields having an ownership outside of its control have no chance whatever; that they are impeded in their business; that if cars are demanded they are not forthcoming; that if a switch is desired it is not constructed, and even though there be an apparent willingness to accommodate the owners of these coal fields, there is always at the same time some apparently good reason for not furnishing them with facilities with which to do business. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company does not confine its operations to the State of West Virginia. It owns to-day one-sixth, I believe, of all the stock of the Reading Company. I do not understand that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company enters the Reading district, yet it owns approximately one-sixth of the stock of the Reading Railroad Company. Why is that? It is claimed that it is a way of securing control of the Reading Railroad and its coal fields by the joint action of the Baltimore and Ohio, the Pennsylvania, and the New York Central. I have not been able to verify this charge and I do not know to what extent it is true; but it is true that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company is a large stockholder in the stock of the Reading Company, a corporation in Pennsylvania.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is a corporation organized under the laws of Maryland, a purely State corporation, getting all its powers from that State. It is authorized by the laws of that State, as I understand it, to own and operate these coal fields either directly or indirectly. How can we strike, then, at the power given by the sovereignty of Maryland to a creation of that sovereignty? The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company does not operate, it is true, only in the State of Maryland. It operates in eight States outside of Maryland, so that as to those eight States it is purely a foreign corporation. It operates, I presume, with the assent of those States, but we know how easily that assent is gained and how few limitations are put upon the exercise of the powers given. The result is that in eight States the transportation system is under the control of a corporation organized under a foreign sovereignty, and its powers are entirely created by that sovereignty. It only illustrates what I have always contended for, that we will never reach a solution of this question until we compel all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to organize under a national charter, a charter created by the people of the United States, through legislation in which every State in the country will share.

In the State of Colorado, I am told, and in the State of Utah, the coal fields are being similarly monopolized. In Colorado, I believe, the coal and iron fields are almost entirely or very largely owned by the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company.

The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] states that they are not largely owned by that corporation.

Mr. TELLER. I mean they do not have the majority of the controlling interest in the coal fields.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course, I am not accurately informed upon the subject, and I ask the Senator from Colorado what proportion of the coal fields in Colorado is owned by the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company?

Mr. TELLER. The Colorado Fuel and Iron Company is a very large corporation, which is not only engaged in mining coal, but in making steel as well. They undoubtedly have in the southern part of the State a considerable area of coal lands, which they mine for coal not only for their own use, but also to sell. It is a coal company as well as a steel company. To say that they have any considerable portion of the vast coal fields of Colorado is a mistake. There are immense fields in Colorado where they have never acquired any title whatever. They can be in no wise said to control the coal trade of that State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Colorado whether the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company is not the owner of a very large proportion of the iron deposits of that State?

Mr. TELLER. They own a great deal of iron. What the proportion is to the whole I do not know, and nobody else knows, because there are vast iron fields that have never been exploited.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the junior Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think the following, perhaps, would be a more definite and accurate statement of the condition of coal-land ownership in Colorado: There are two great coal corporations that own by far the largest area of coal lands now being worked in southern Colorado—that is, south of a line drawn, approximately, through the State that is known as the "Divide"—the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company and the Victor Fuel Company. Those coals are bituminous, and are coking coals; and while there are individual owners of small tracts of coal lands in the northern part of the State, I think it may be safely said that these two coal corporations—one a coal and steel corporation and the other purely a coal corporation—own, I will say, two-thirds of the coal lands that are now being worked south of the Divide. The coal of the lands north of the Divide belongs to the lignite class of coal, and neither of the two corporations mentioned own any of those lands. The lands north of the Divide are owned by a very considerable number of individuals and companies. I think I could name twelve or thirteen or fourteen different coal companies that own the coal lands in the northern coal fields—the southern coal being bituminous and coking coal, the northern coal being lignite and noncoking.

So that the claim of the Senator from Nevada would be largely true as to the coal lands of the southern part of the State, but it would not be accurate in any degree or to any extent whatever with reference to the lands in the northern part of the State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the junior Senator from Colorado whether the tendency is not toward a concentration of the ownership of the coal fields in the northern part of the State?

Mr. PATTERSON. There is but one considerable owner of coal lands in the northern part of the State, the Northern Coal Company. Its ownership may amount to several thousand acres of coal lands; but the rest of the coal land, and it covers a very vast area in the northern part of the State, is owned by individual operators; and I can not see any tendency in the northern coal fields to the consolidation of very considerable tracts of coal land in the hands of any particular corporation or group of individuals.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But I understand the more valuable coals are the bituminous coals in the southern part of the State?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; they are the more valuable for all sorts of industrial enterprises.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the tendency there is toward concentration and consolidation?

Mr. PATTERSON. The lignite coal is used simply for domestic and steel-making purposes. Our bituminous coals are used very largely for the making of coke as well as for domestic purposes. The lands in the southern part of the State are already pretty well consolidated in the hands of these two companies. I know there are, however, individuals and individual companies who own some of the mines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Colorado whether twenty years ago, or within a comparatively recent period, all these lands in the southern part of Colorado which are concentrated mainly in the two companies of which he speaks were not in the ownership of the Government as public lands?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; I would say that thirty years ago the great bulk of them were owned by the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And is not that true also of the iron deposits which they own?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not know much about the iron deposits. I do not think there are many iron deposits now being worked in Colorado. I know of one in Saguache County that is being operated by the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, but I do not think there are many iron companies that are being worked.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Where does this company get the iron from which it makes its steel?

Mr. PATTERSON. I can not give the Senator from Nevada that information, because I have not investigated it. I think it owns iron mines in New Mexico, but where it gets the bulk of its ores I do not know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is safe to say, I presume, that all the iron deposits which the two companies own were, within a comparatively recent period, in the ownership of the United States as public lands?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; within, say, thirty or thirty-five years.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it is not very important, perhaps, in connection with this bill, but I do not like to have the Senator from Nevada make a statement which does not quite represent the situation. My colleague has spoken of the southern coal fields. Within the last year I know of land being sold in the southern section of the State which did not go to this corporation at all. It was sold for about twenty to twenty-two dollars an acre. If the Senator wants to engage in the coal business I can point him to some very cheap coal lands out there that I know to be good coal lands. I do not own them, but I know who does. In the northwestern part of Colorado we have certainly as much coal as there is south of the Divide. There are several fields south of the Divide of which my colleague has not spoken, particularly the Arkansas field, where at least thirty-five years ago I know coal land was being purchased and mined. In the northwestern part of the State there are thousands and thousands of acres of the finest bituminous coal land in the world.

There is also anthracite coal and cannel coal, and practically all varieties of coal, in that part of the State, and, with small exceptions, no part of it is in the hands of the coal companies of the State. There is one coal company my colleague did not mention, the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company, leaving the "Iron" out. That is organized with a capital of about a million dollars, owning coal in southern Colorado, in northern Colorado, and in western Colorado—in all parts of the State. It has not committed any act that anybody can complain of up to the present time. It has opened coal mines, and is producing a lot of coal and selling only to the people of the State.

There is to-day no fear by anybody in Colorado of combinations that will prevent the ordinary man from getting all the coal land he wants if he is willing to pay for it. There is to-day a considerable coal-land area in southern Colorado the title to which is in the United States, which a man can acquire for $10 an acre away from the railroad and $20 if it is nearer the railroad.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I did not pretend to give an accurate statement regarding Colorado, nor was it necessary to give an absolutely accurate statement, in order to point my argument. I think the Senators from Colorado have given us sufficient information upon the subject to enable us to ascertain that the tendency there is toward consolidation, and that in the southern portion of Colorado that consolidation has been accomplished through the ownership of two great fuel companies; and I think I am safe in saying that one of these companies, the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, is one of the greatest political factors that exists in the control of that State.

Now, as to the State of Utah, the coal lands are gradually drifting out of the ownership of the Government and into the hands of private parties. I am told that the coal lands within the reach of railroads there have for the most part drifted into the hands either of the railroads or of corporations controlled by the railroads. I can not see that any one of those corporations should be blamed for obtaining these coal deposits. They are absolutely necessary in the operation of the roads, and they have been, doubtless, diligent in the prosecution of their carrying business in looking out for deposits of coal from which to obtain cheap coal and thus economically operate their roads.

No one can object to the spirit which animated these roads in the acquisition of these coal properties. What we object to is the extension of it in the line of monopoly. We find that these lands, which, according to the statement of the Senator from Colorado, thirty years ago belonged to the entire people of the United States, are now drifting into the hands of monopolies which are likely to be controlled for the purpose of oppressing the people of the United States.

I have no doubt the most innocent of motives led the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad originally into the acquisition of coal properties; but with the instinct of man for acquisition that sentiment has gradually grown until we find now these corporations are controlling practically the coal product of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. We find that in the Western States, where these lands have been within thirty years in the ownership of the whole people, they are now being gradually drifted into the hands of these giant corporations. And yet we take no action. You can hardly get a man from the Western States, from the section I represent, to vote for a measure that will prevent the sale of these coal lands and maintain their proprietorship in the great mass of the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to state that, as far as the State of Utah is concerned, her coal lands were, as a general thing, taken up by individuals. I know of no law, nor do I think the Senator from Nevada knows of one, that will prevent them from selling those coal lands to whoever they please. The coal lands have been transferred, it is true, as the Senator from Nevada says, to railroad corporations, as they are of very little value whatever unless a railroad is near them to take the product of the mines to the market. The railroads themselves have not acquired the coal lands in our State other than by purchase, and I do not know how the Senator from Nevada is going to prevent that. As far as I am personally concerned, I do not see that it would be a very good thing to prevent it. If the parties who acquired the coal lands, who filed on or purchased them, desired to sell them to the railroad companies, I can not see why they should be prevented from doing it.

There are three great counties of our State that may be called coal-land counties—Carbon County, Emery County, and Iron County. The great coal fields in Iron County are mostly owned to-day by individuals. You can not ship coal from there, owing to the fact that there is no railroad in there, and a great portion of the titles are still in the hands of the individuals who first located them. But in the other two counties that furnish coal for the market it is true that they are virtually controlled by a company, the Utah Fuel Company. I can not say positively whether that company is controlled absolutely by the railroad company or not; but it is understood, of course, that they are very closely connected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is not my contention that we should in any way prevent any man who has acquired coal lands either from the Government or from private proprietors from selling those lands to whomsoever he chooses. I am now talking about the policy that the National Government as the proprietor of the coal lands now remaining in its possession should pursue, as to whether or not it should encourage this system of private entry of the coal lands, their sale, their gradual concentration and consolidation in the hands of great corporations, a system which will inevitably end in monopoly and in the oppression of the people unless we come to the conclusion in the future that we will regulate by legislation fixing the price of coal.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator from Nevada if we can not very simply and effectively dispose of this whole matter by passing a national incorporation law, providing in that law that no railway shall be engaged in other business than the business of a common carrier and compelling all railways doing an interstate business to reincorporate under the national law?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We can certainly do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that is a remedy.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to have the support of the Senator from North Dakota. I have found one convert at last. Probably the Senator from North Dakota anticipated me in the view. But I am sure we will win more converts as we advance, and that the ultimate solution of this question is that the machines that are to do interstate commerce shall be created by the sovereignty that has jurisdiction as broad as interstate commerce itself, and only by that sovereignty; that we will never permit the smaller sovereignty to create the machines that are to do the greater sovereign's business.

But I am not now intent upon that. I am now intent upon this question of the monopoly of coal. I do not pretend to give any solution, but I do wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the great coal deposits in Colorado, in Utah, and in other States in the West are gradually being consolidated under the control of great industrial corporations, which will ultimately use their powers, just as they have throughout the United States, for the purpose of oppressing the masses of the people; that those lands thirty-five years ago were the property of the entire people of the United States, and that there are vast areas there still that are now the property of the people of the United States, and yet we take no measures to prevent the acquisition of those lands by private parties and the gradual drifting of the entire coal domain of the United States into the hands of monopoly.

And the Congress of the United States sits apathetic and inert when this condition of things confronts them. I was remarking that you could get hardly a Senator or a Representative from the Western States, where these coal lands are, to favor an act that would do away with the existing condition of things. Why? Not because they favor monopolies, not because they favor the concentration of the ownership of these coal lands, but because they stand for the development of their States, and they are anxious, therefore, that the public lands shall drift out of public ownership, where they are untaxed, where they are unresponsive to the demands of the western people for general local development into the hands of private individuals where they can be taxed and where the taxes can aid the development of the States of the West.

I am absolutely sympathetic with that feeling of the West. The feeling of the West looks to the development of great Commonwealths through the increase of population and the increase of wealth. But it seems to me that if we are wise we can accomplish both purposes—the development of the West and the restraint of monopoly—by holding the title of these lands forever in the people, where it now rests, and providing for leases of the lands by the United States Government, the United States Government reserving the control, if necessary, to fix the price, so as to prevent monopoly and to prevent oppression, and then providing that the royalties from the leases, or a certain proportion of them at least, shall go to the Commonwealth where the coal lands lie, so that the proceeds can be used in the local development of the State. It seems to me, at all events, that we can prevent the monopoly of the future if we can not altogether destroy the monopoly of the past.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Would he recommend the same procedure as to the development of other mineral lands, and that the Government should reserve the right to lease those as he would the coal lands? Does he recommend the repeal of the law whereby a person can take up coal lands in our part of the country?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do, and the substitution of a leasing law. The Senator asked me whether I would apply that to all mineral deposits. I will say that I would apply it to any where there was danger of monopoly.

Mr. SPOONER. It would make some difference in applying it as to whether the article is a necessary of life?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; it would make a great difference as to whether the article was an absolute necessity of life.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he would apply that to the product known as "borax," which is a monopoly, I understand.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I would apply it to soda and to borax, and I would apply it also to the timber lands, for we are in danger of an absolute monopoly in the lumber supply of the country. We know to-day that for years the practice has existed of taking clerks and school-teachers from the great cities up to the timber lands and securing locations in the interest of great purchasers, and obtaining title, and then turning over vast areas so acquired to great corporations. This condition has existed throughout the West, and it has created a standard of morals which has resulted in the sad occurrences in Oregon, a state of morals that justifies tampering with and evading the land laws of the country, just as many women, honest and high-minded evade the tariff laws. We have so illy adapted those laws to the economic requirements of the West that they feel they are justified in evading these laws, and the result is that we are constantly pursuing people in the West with criminal indictments who according to the public sentiment there are entirely innocent of any intentional wrong. Yet at the same time we are neglecting to reform the laws, which have made evasion necessary there in order to meet the economic requirements of the West.

Mr. President, I do not know that I have been very suggestive as to remedies. I have had but little familiarity with the subject under discussion, but my attention has just been brought to it by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and my object in rising was to direct attention to the fact that we have now a practical monopoly of the coal supply in two great coal-producing States, West Virginia and Pennsylvania; that there are tendencies toward consolidation and monopoly in other States, and that the people of the United States have still in reserve a great domain of coal and timber land which we ought to preserve for the reasonable and unmonopolized use of all the people for all time.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to reopen the question of order which I suggested to the Chair, but as I find that what I stated was not sufficiently clearly stated to be understood at least by the Senators who sat around me, I desire again to state it in order that the proposition may be properly presented by myself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Georgia suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. House bill 12707—the "statehood bill," so called.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside for the day, to remain as the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is no question as to the rule that only two amendments can be pending at the same time to a given proposition. That is a general rule and an elementary one. There is, however, another rule which is equally well known. When two propositions are pending, one an original proposition and the other in the nature of a substitute to the other, each for the purpose of amendment is treated as an original proposition and is subject to the law of amendment as an original proposition, and not as an amendment.

Now, what is the status before the Senate of the section under discussion? Section 13 of the bill is the section under discussion. It comes from the House. The committee proposes to strike out that section and insert in lieu thereof another substantive section, covering four pages. So the matters before the Senate are in nature and are in fact an original proposition and a substitute therefor. In other words, it is not the situation of an original proposition with a pending amendment, but in the view of parliamentary law it is the same as two independent propositions, one of them the original, the other the substitute.

Now, Mr. President, in every book on parliamentary law the rule will be found laid down that when there is an original proposition pending, and also a substitute pending therefor, the body having it under consideration has the right to perfect each before a vote is taken upon either, and that in the process for the perfection of either by amendment each is taken as an original proposition and not as an amendment. In other words, the substitute when it is under consideration for amendment, although technically it is an amendment, is for this purpose not treated as an amendment, but as an original proposition, and therefore, treated as an original proposition, two amendments can be pending to it at the same time.

The rule of practice as laid down in the books is that when one, either the original proposition or the substitute, is thus perfected it will be laid aside and the other taken up and perfected in the same way, in order that the body may have before it the two perfected propositions between which it will choose.

Now, if there is any doubt about that I am prepared to furnish any amount of authority upon it as being the correct rule. I submit that this is that exact situation. It is not the case of a proposition to which there is a partial amendment proposed, but it is a case where the original proposition is proposed by the committee to be displaced and substituted by an altogether independent, substantive, integral proposition, complete within itself, and entitled to be treated as a substantive, integral proposition when we come to consider amendments proposed to it.

I thought it due to myself, Mr. President, that I should make that statement; and I am very sorry that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who stated the rule applicable to this case as one so very elementary as not to permit a doubt, is not here to hear the statement which I make in regard thereto, and as to the correctness of which, I repeat, I have not the slightest doubt.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I can not allow the statement made by the Senator from Nevada as to the western country and the lawless character of the inhabitants to pass without a protest. I do not know when the Senator from Nevada went West, but I do know that he must have fallen into an unfortunate community if he gathered his facts from that community, because he does not state a condition that exists in that part of the West, at least, that I have lived in for forty-five years.

In the State of Colorado, embracing 100,000 square miles, I will venture to say there is more coal land that is not taken up and the title is in the Government than has been taken up. I will venture to say that in southern Colorado there is more coal land outside of these two great corporations that my colleague has mentioned than they own. I can name two other great companies that own coal land down there. I can name a great many individuals who own coal land.

A man can take, under the laws of the United States, only 160 acres of coal land if it is returned as coal land; and it is the duty of the surveyors when they go over it to return it as coal land if it is coal land. There are thousands and thousands of acres. He can buy that, if it is returned, by doing a certain amount of work on it, developing it, and showing that it is coal land, if it is more than 20 miles from a railroad, by the payment of $10 an acre; if it is within 20 miles of a railroad, $20 per acre.

Now, in anticipation of a railroad that is being built in Colorado, I have no doubt that within the last three years perhaps there have been forty or fifty thousand acres of coal land taken up in that State. The man who wants to take 160 acres of land files on it, proves to the satisfaction of the Government of the United States that it is coal land, and pays $10 an acre, and if the railroad should fail he will hold it, as some men have to my knowledge, for twenty-five years before he will probably sell it.

Now, there is not any complaint of monopoly of coal in Colorado. I do not speak for any other section. I think I have quite as much knowledge of conditions in Colorado as the Senator from Nevada.

I want to say, again, we have in many portions of the State more or less timber. About one-half of Colorado is prairie; more than one-half, if you take the open bottoms on the rivers in the mountains. But nearly one-half is east of the Rocky Mountains. Then we have the Rocky Mountains. Then we have the land lying along the streams, and frequently for several miles along the streams there are prairies also.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that I have just received a memorandum, unsigned, from the gallery, making some statements regarding the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, and I would like to read it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can read it now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to read it and ascertain from the Senator whether it is correct.

The Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, by itself and its subsidiary corporations, owns and controls practically all the coal fields worked at the present time in the Territory of New Mexico, and have done so for years. It also controls all the iron mines that are at present worked in that Territory or which are accessible by railroad.

Recently the Phelps-Dodge concern, which operates mines and smelters extensively in southeastern Arizona, purchased three or four hundred miles of railroad in New Mexico to reach the Dawson coal fields in northeastern New Mexico, and which this latter concern is now operating, but only for the use of its own railroads and smelters, and is not selling coal in the open market in competition with anybody. In other words, the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company controls the entire coal trade, railroad and commercial, with the above exception, of both New Mexico and Arizona, as well as northern Sonora, in Mexico.

At Gallup, N. Mex., one or two struggling independent operators are still in existence. They were shut out by the secret rebates of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, received from the Santa Fe Railroad Company, and out of which such a scandal and such heavy suits have recently arisen, or at least within the last year and a half.

Mr. TELLER. I am not going to say what is the condition in New Mexico. It is enough for me to deal with my own bailiwick. I understand this company does mine coal down there, but whether it mines any considerable amount or not I know but little about it. I recollect very well the scandal that came up as to a rebate that had been paid by the Santa Fe Company to this coal company. That is not a question I care to go into now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator made an allusion a few moments ago to my comments upon the morals of the West regarding public lands; and if the Senator will permit me I wish to say a word on that matter.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I intended no reflection whatever on the moral standards of the West. What I was contending for was that our land legislation has not met the economic requirements of the West, and whenever that is the case we always find that the law is overridden.

Now, with reference to the actual condition of morals there, let me give as an illustration an instance which occurred to me recently. The Senator knows that under the homestead law it is necessary to state, I believe, under oath, is it——

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That the applicant intends to use the lands as a homestead. He is compelled to live on those lands for five years and then he gets title without the payment of anything; but he can commute, if he chooses, I believe, after fourteen months by the payment of a dollar and a quarter an acre.

In going out over those great ranges I have have ridden with "buckayros," as they are called—"vaqueros" sometimes by others who ride on those ranges—and they have told me just as a matter of fact that they had made entries for the owners of property of such homesteads with the intention of having a nominal residence there, and it is very apparent that they had simply a nominal residence for fourteen months, and then turned the title over to the owners.

Recently I met in the Orient an eastern man, a man of the highest reputation in the East, who has very high standards of integrity and who is regarded as one of the leading men in reform. He told me that he had acquired a very large ranch in the West. I asked him how he had acquired it. "Well," he said, "it was rather limited at first, but we gradually enlarged it. We got our cowboys to make entries under the homestead act, and so forth, and in that way we got title," I said to him: "Did you know that you have been following there the practices that have secured convictions of two or three people in recent trials?"

Now, that shows what a condition of indifference there was.

Mr. TELLER. That was out in Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it was not in Nevada. I will not mention the State because I do not wish to be invidious, but it was not in Nevada. What I say is, that the West has practically administered the land laws itself.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose I may fairly presume that when the Senator was riding with people who said they had been infringing the law, that was probably in Nevada.

Mr. President, I was saying that we have timber in Colorado. We have very little commercial timber in Colorado. There may be occasionally a piece of land taken for the timber under the preemption act, or it may be under the homestead act, but there never has been any large aggregation of timber land in Colorado. I do not know that I have ever heard any complaint about it, nor have I heard any complaint about the coal land.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada wants to introduce a new system for the Government of the United States. It has been coming on for some time. I know some people who think that the Government of the United States ought to run all the farms, or if the General Government can not do it that the State ought to do it.

Up in the Northwest, only two or three years ago, I met a very intelligent person who had emigrated from the East out West, and he coolly told me that he thought if the wheat fields of that great State of Idaho were only under the control of the United States they could raise better wheat and more of it and cheaper than the individuals could, and he was anxious to turn over everything to the Government.

The Senator wants the Government to retain this coal land, and then lease it out. I do not think I need say to the Senator that I should have to find authority for the Government to enter into that business, but the Senator is satisfied that the Government can do anything it wants to do. I am not quite up to that standard, Mr. President. I have an idea that when the Government held this land, it did not hold it as the owner of 160 acres of land holds it for his benefit. Nor was it expected that the Government of the United States would ever enter into the farming business or the timber business. The Government of the United States started out in the beginning with the idea that the land was to be occupied by the people and not held by the Government. Does anybody here believe that we would be in a better condition to-day if the Government should hold this land and lease it out? Mr. President, a man must be ignorant of the history of this country who would say that it would have been better to have kept the title in the Government and not have had it in the individual. The halcyon day will come to the West when the Government shall no longer put its hand on our land, when every acre of land everywhere will be in private ownership.

Mr. President, by this insane notion that the Government of the United States must hold these lands for unborn generations, we have now in the State of Colorado one-fifth of the entire State tied up by forest reserves, so that no settler can go there—thousands and thousands of acres of land which ought to be under cultivation.

Mr. President, when there had not been a surveyor's chain in the State of Colorado, I once saw men brought before a United States court charged with unlawfully cutting timber on the public land. After their prosecution had proceeded for some time, the judge sitting there said, "Why, gentlemen, while the law may say these men can not cut timber on the public lands, the Government has said they might come here, that they might live here; and the timber in this desk behind which I sit was cut in violation of law; the church on the corner of the street was built of timber cut in violation of law, and do you mean to say, Mr. Prosecutor, that I must send these men to the penitentiary because, there being no way that they could cut timber and not infringe upon a law that had fallen into disuse—do you mean to say that I must send them to the penitentiary?" The prosecutor said he did. The judge, exhibiting the sense which is usual with American judges, said "I dismiss this case." And when they appealed here to Washington the authorities here said to that district attorney, "You must not prosecute any more of those people;" and we cut that timber, Mr. President, and we built up a community which alone has sent into the circulation of the world a billion dollars of gold and silver since 1861.

For fifteen years or more, Mr. President, we had to cut timber in violation of law or leave the country. It was only when the State got representatives in this Senate that it was able to secure a law which would enable a man to cut timber without violating the old statute that had fallen into disuse and which was enacted originally for the purpose of protecting ship timber and not protecting other timber on the public domain. There would have been no population west of the Mississippi River if that statute had been put into full force and operation.

Mr. President, the title to land in the State of Colorado may be in the Government of the United States, but by a law that has been applied everywhere it belongs to the people of that State; and the time will never come when the Senator will see the Government of the United States degrade itself to become the owner of coal mines any more than he will in a few years, when we shall have aroused public attention to the matter, see the Government cutting and selling timber to the settler at 25 cents a cord or 50 cents a cord, as some irresponsible agent of the Government may think it should and as they have been doing.

Mr. President, from the time the Pilgrims landed on the shores of New England they claimed the right to go upon the public land, and they claimed the right to get title to it, and though the King of Great Britain gave the land out in great tracts and the Dutch King did the same in the region which is now New York, yet in time it all passed into private ownership. Such ownership has been the strength and glory of the great mass of the people, and the fact that the people owned the land upon which they live and that nobody could make them afraid has made the country rich and great.

Mr. President, the people of the West are as law-abiding as any people in the world; they have exhibited as high a state of morals as has been exhibited by any other people in the world. We in the West are not vagabonds. We have, Mr. President, I venture to say, in the city of Denver more men and more women who have been graduated from eastern colleges than can be found in any New England city of the same size.

Mr. President, we of the West have made a great community. Within nineteen States west of the Mississippi River we have got at least one-fifth, nay, more than that, one-fourth of the population of the country. We produce more than one-half the wealth that comes to this country by exportation of agricultural products from the States which lie west of the Mississippi River, which may be called "Western States." We have produced immense wealth in the form of gold, silver, copper, and lead, and we claim the right to own the lands there and not to have them farmed out for the profits to be distributed elsewhere. Those lands belong to us, and I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that we shall see to it that they come to us and to nobody else.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that the United States Government holds this vast public domain in trust. All I contend for is that that trust should be for home seekers and not for monopolists.

The land laws of the United States are to be commended in so far as they turn Government ownership into private ownership for the purpose of securing individual homes to the settlers in the West. They are wise in that they promote the development of the mines that produce the precious metals; that they stimulate enterprise and energy and courage in searching for those metals which constitute the money supply of the world, the medium of exchange upon which all commerce is dependent. They are wise in so far as they develop the natural resources of the West in the interest, not only of those localities, but in the development of the wealth and population of the United States; but I contend that they are not wise where economic necessity compels their evasion. They certainly were not wise in the instance which the Senator from Colorado presents, where a person going upon public lands for the purpose of securing wood for fuel or timber for building his house was subject to prosecution for theft. The Senator, therefore, admits in that very statement that the laws themselves were defective.

The laws are not wise in so far as they have provided for a home of only 160 acres, for we realize that while 160 acres of valley land in a humid region may support a family, 160 acres in the arid region will not support a family. We know that they were unwise in not permitting considerable areas to be put under one reclamation project, so that an entire tract could be irrigated and after irrigation divided up into small tracts and turned into individual homes. They were wise in so far as they allowed a single individual to get title to a small area of timber land for the purpose of erecting a sawmill and supplying the neighborhood and the market with lumber. They are not wise when they permit a million acres of that land to be concentrated in the ownership of a single corporation. Such ownership may not be limited to a million acres, for by combination among these various companies the entire timber region of the West may ultimately fall under the control of one corporation.

I stand for individual homes in the West; I stand for the protection of the individual home seeker, and I stand for a policy which will give to him at a reasonable price the necessities of life. What is one of the great necessities of life in this climate? Coal, that warms the house and cooks the food; coal, that furnishes power for all the varied machinery of production; and it is essential to the home seeker that coal should be secured at a reasonable price. It is the duty of the Government, which now owns this vast public domain, to see that those great coal deposits are preserved in such a way as to protect the rights of the home seeker and of the home maker.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to ask the Senator if he can recall a single instance where the production is cheaper or is even as cheap or as reasonable under Government ownership as under the private ownership of the greatest trust or combination that ever existed?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I can not. I have not looked into that matter. My proposition does not involve Government production, let me say to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. But it involves the principle, does it not, of the Government leasing of coal lands?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the Government leasing of coal lands necessarily presumes lessees, it presumes laborers?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And Government control of that would be influence by combinations of laborers who are in the coal mines, and who would elect their Senators and their Representatives to represent them for higher-priced labor; and would not the result inevitably be, under any system of Government ownership, that everything would cost the people more than it possibly could cost them under any system that we have ever known?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think so. What does the Government ownership of these coal lands imply? That the Government itself shall run the coal mines? Not at all; but that the Government, under wise restriction, shall lease these coal lands to the coal operators for a sufficient time and in sufficient quantity to warrant private capital in putting up the necessary works.

What does the Government receive? It can demand, if it chooses, a royalty, small or large. I presume, with a view to making coal as cheap as possible, it would make that royalty very small, probably only sufficient to make that property yield to the State in which it is situated an amount equal to the taxes on the property if in private ownership. It would lease these lands, not for the profit of the United States, not that the income should go into the General Treasury for the benefit of the entire people, but for the purpose of providing a fund to be turned over to the State and which would be a substitute for the taxes paid on these lands if in private ownership, and that only. The taxes on these lands in private ownership would, of course, increase the price of coal to the consumer, for every cost to the operator must be reflected in the price of coal itself to the consumer; but if the royalties demanded by the United States Government should only equal the amount of taxes, I ask how can the price be increased to the consumer?

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator says, as I understand, that if taxes were levied upon these coal lands it would increase the price of coal to the consumer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. And he proposes to avoid that by having the coal miners pay a royalty to the Government and letting that royalty go back into taxes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. To the State.

Mr. FULTON. After they paid that royalty, would not that increase the price of coal to the consumer just the same?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Just the same, as I have stated.

Mr. FULTON. Therefore, where is the advantage?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Recollect that when the coal lands are in private ownership there is no restraint or control over the owner as to the price which he shall charge for his coal unless you adopt general sumptuary laws throughout the United States and fix by law the price of coal. Otherwise, he has the right to charge whatever he chooses—whatever he can get.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator made a statement a few moments ago that he had no objection to 160 acres of timber land going to an individual in order that he might erect a sawmill and engage in the manufacture of lumber. Does the Senator think that a sawmill would be erected and put in operation by a man who only had 160 acres of land to supply it, and pay a royalty on it as well?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It certainly could be in some cases. As to whether or not 160 acres could be as economically developed as a thousand acres, I am not prepared to say. It would depend upon the location of the 160 acres.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator is speaking about getting these products to the people as cheaply as possible. Does not the Senator know that a large sawmill, constructed with all modern appliances and a large area of timber from which to draw, can supply the people much more cheaply than a little one-horse mill running on 160 acres of timber?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator answer me a question there?

Mr. FULTON. I will if I can.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is, whether it is necessary for a single corporation to own a million acres of land in order to produce lumber economically?

Mr. FULTON. I do not place any limit. I do not say whether or not it is necessary to own a million or a half million acres, but I do say that it is necessary to have a large area of timber land supplying a mill in order that the mill may be run economically.

While I do not wish to take any of the Senator's time to discuss this question, I want to suggest this: A great many people who live in the mountains or out on the prairies are in the habit of talking about timber land. The Senator, I believe, resides in Nevada. I have never heard that that State was a largely timbered region, and, perhaps, he is not as familiar with the conditions that are necessary to develop the lumber resources as are people who live in the timbered region. I suggest that it would be very proper, at least, for the people who are proposing to regulate the sale of the public domain to consult, to some extent, as the Senator from Colorado has said, the people who live where these lands are held, who are interested in the development of those sections of the country, who have studied those problems, and perhaps have reached as fair a solution regarding them as those who live thousands of miles away, who solve them by theories.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree with the Senator from Oregon that the people who live in the region where timber is produced are to be consulted with reference to the economic development of the country in which they live; but I think that people who live outside of those regions are also interested, particularly where it involves a matter so essential to convenience and comfort and even to life itself as the use of lumber. I do not share in the view of the Senator that only those who live in the timbered regions know about timber. I lived for a long time in California, where there are great areas of timber land, and I had some familiarity with timber lands there. I live in Nevada, and there, on the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevadas, we had very extensive ranges of timber, but under unwise timber laws those timber lands were taken up, the mountains were absolutely denuded of the forests, and the Comstock became what was called the "Grave of the Sierras."

That timber was absolutely essential to the great mining development of the Comstock, but the cutting of that timber could have been conducted in such a way as to have produced just as substantial results and yet have preserved the forests for all time as a constantly continuing source of prosperity; but under unwise timber laws those mountains are bare to-day, no longer producing lumber and no longer affording the shelter for the snow, that natural reservoir of water, holding it in suspense until the hot season comes and then letting it out, as required, upon the fertile but arid plains below. So that I have some knowledge and I have some experience, although I come from a State whose scanty timber reserves were destroyed under unwise timber laws. Had the forest laws of to-day been applicable then these forests would have been preserved, the mature timber only being cut, and the young growth constantly protected until maturity was reached.

The Senator asks, Can it be possible that a lumber enterprise can be conducted on 160 acres of land? It might be possible if the land were favorably located and the timber upon it were sufficiently thick, but I do not contend that in all cases 160 acres is sufficient for the proper and economic development of the lumber industry.

I want to preserve that industry as a competitive industry. If we are to let these lands drift into private ownership, I am willing to allow the units of ownership to be sufficiently large to accomplish the greatest economical development of that industry consistent with the maintenance of competition; but I am not willing to permit those lands to drift, as they are drifting and as they have drifted, into concentrated ownership, prolific of that monopoly which is the prevailing curse of the country to-day, and I think it would be much wiser for the Government to retain the fee of the timber lands and to sell the stumpage at reasonable rates and in such quantities as will not recklessly waste the forest supply. I insist upon it that the statesmen of the West ought themselves to be the leaders of this reform regarding the lands of the West. They can inaugurate methods here which will be more potential in building up those Commonwealths than the present system. We must be candid with ourselves and recognize that abuses exist—abuses that ought to be cured.

It is said this means Government production and the Government going into business. Not so; it simply means that the Government retains the land containing these great coal deposits for the demands of the future, not for the purpose of making money out of them, not for the purpose of securing profits, but for the purpose of protecting the entire people of the United States against monopoly and extortion. Does the Senator contend for a moment that a great company, having obtained the privilege of cutting the mature timber on public timber lands, by the payment of reasonable royalties in the shape of stumpage, can not accomplish the economic development of the lumber industry just as well as if it had private ownership of the land itself?

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask the Senator a question; but first let me premise my question by this statement: The Government to-day has withdrawn in the timber States of the West practically all of the timbered lands. In the State of Oregon there is withdrawn to-day for forest reserve purposes over one-fifth of the entire area. The Government is proposing now to sell, as the Senator knows, and in many instances is selling the timber without any limit as to the amount that one person can take individually to log and to manufacture into lumber.

Will the Senator tell me that it is any less of a monopoly for the Government to put the lands in reserves and thus prevent them from contributing to public charges in the way of taxes and from sustaining the public by the way of paying taxes, than it is to allow one individual to take just as much timber or just as wide an area of timber as he may see fit to pay for and take? I ask the Senator if a monopoly does not exist just the same so long as he controls the timber, whether he owns the soil and fee simple title or not? Does not the monopoly exist in the control of the timber, and is not the Government, by the system that it is pursuing to-day, giving the same monopoly that the Senator is complaining of? And yet, mind you, all of that land is withdrawn from private entry and from private sale and purchase. It does not contribute a dollar in the way of taxes to sustain the public; it does not contribute anything toward the public burden. Men may not go on there and enter it for homes.

The Senator says he is in favor of building up homes. So am I. I believe that the public domain was intended to be used for the purpose of providing homes for settlers. I do not believe it was ever intended by the founders of this Government that it should be withdrawn and withheld permanently from private entry and private purchase and sale. I submit to the Senator that it is immeasurably better that this land should be held in private ownership, even though it be held in large bodies, than that it shall be reserved permanently by the Government and sold at public bids, without reference to the quantity that one may purchase or one may secure over which he may exercise control. The monopoly that the Senator is talking about is not being prevented or lessened by this policy he is supporting and the policy against which the people of the West are complaining.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator inquired whether monopoly under a lease can not be as bad as monopoly under ownership. I answer yes, if the monopoly under lease is permitted. The difference between the two is that monopoly under ownership can not be prevented by the General Government, for it is not a party in interest. Monopoly under lease can be prevented, because the Government can so shape the lease as to the area leased, and by proper restrictions and limitations in the lease itself, as to absolutely prevent monopoly.

Mr. FULTON. Permit me to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me make a complete answer to what the Senator has said. Let me say further to the Senator that if monopoly exists to-day under the present system of the control of the forests of the country by the Department of Agriculture, my answer is that we can easily cure it by legislation, for the lands are the public lands, and I will cooperate with the Senator in such legislation. The Senator complains because large areas——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion right there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator had the floor quite a while, and I ask permission to make my reply continuous.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada declines to yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

The Senator complains that the Administration, acting under the authority of law, recollect, is now making large reservations in the West. I claim that, even though the injury may be a temporary one, it is wise to do that in order that the Government may catch its breath. We have been going along headlong in this movement for transferring to the hands of monopoly the domain of the entire people. I do not complain of that part of the land laws which puts the public domain into the private ownership of individual home seekers and home makers. On the contrary, I advocate it and I would seek to perfect it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I do not understand the rule of the Department of Agriculture as it has been stated by the Senator from Oregon. I understand that the supervisor of a forest reserve can sell to an individual $100 worth of timber within the reserve without an advertisement, and then if it is more than $100, and not to exceed $500, they have to advertise at least sixty days. I can not see why the Senator from Oregon asked the question as to the Department selling great tracts of timber, when the rule of the Department, as I understand it, does not allow it.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me to do so, I will explain.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Nevada was talking about the monopoly that was secured by the entry of timber under the land laws permitting private entry. I said so far as the monopoly in timber is concerned the same monopoly could be secured under the present administration of the Bureau of Forestry, because there is no limit to the amount of timber that one individual can secure. The Senator is mistaken if he thinks there is. There is absolutely no limit, and they are selling it to individuals without any limit. I know that to be a fact.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say is that, as far as the State of Utah is concerned, the supervisor of any forest reserve has only authority to sell $100 worth of timber to any one single individual.

Mr. FULTON. Without advertisement.

Mr. SMOOT. Without advertisement; and when that $100 worth of timber is cut into lumber, then and not until then can the supervisor sell to him another $100 worth. If he desires more than $100 worth he has to advertise for sixty days. The $500 worth of timber is sold to him, and that has to be cut and used before he can advertise for another $500 worth. That is the rule of the Department, as far as our State is concerned.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So that, as I understand it, the administration of the Department is not tending toward the creation of monopoly; but whether that be so or not, I contend that if we reserve these great coal deposits——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield in a moment. If we reserve these great areas of timber land and provide a system for leasing or sale of stumpage, Congress itself can, in the law authorizing it, absolutely prevent monopoly, and if monopoly is sought to be accomplished under the lease, the lease can be made in such a way as to prevent it in the future.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator says he understands the Department is not creating a monopoly. The Senator from Utah explains the rule governing forestry as regards forest reserves in Utah; but that is not the rule that is in force in other States—in Washington and in Oregon. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] had a provision attached to the last agricultural appropriation bill, I believe, restricting the sales in Idaho. I will ask the Senator if I am not correct?

Mr. HEYBURN. Preventing them.

Mr. FULTON. Preventing them, in Idaho.

That applied only to Idaho. But what I call the Senator's attention to is the fact that it requires constant legislation. Does the Senator think he can prevent this by the present system or by a system of leasing? He will find there will constantly be required new legislation and other legislation. What I contend is that it is a wise policy to sell the lands that are fit for private ownership and keep them subject to private entry and sale and let the people get hold of them and get the titles. Then you can deal with monopolies by general law, and regulate those questions at the proper time; but I am opposed to the theory and the policy of retaining in the public ownership wide areas of public lands. I believe it is not the best policy. I believe it is not conducive to the best public interest and the welfare of the people. That is my position.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I understand the position of the Senator from Oregon, and I have no doubt he is well intentioned in taking that position and has a proper regard for the welfare of the community in which he lives and of a great part of the United States. All I can say is that I differ with him in his views, and I have endeavored, in my feeble way, to present my reasons for that difference.

I believe that if the men of the West themselves will determine to enter upon the consecutive study of these land laws just as we did upon the study of the irrigation question—through a select committee outside of Congress, composed of senators and representatives of each State and Territory—we will, in the end, reconcile our differences, and we will present to the people of the entire country a scheme of legislation such as was presented in the irrigation act, which will absolutely stand as a barrier against a monopoly of any kind and which will preserve this great domain for the home seekers and the home makers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the discussion has broadened a good deal beyond the questions raised for the consideration of the Senate upon the amendment I offered.

I have been much impressed with one thought that seems to run through the discussion on the part of every Senator who has risen here to speak to the question. Every Senator has said he is in favor of accomplishing the purpose of the amendment. Each one has recognized the importance of the question. Each one has declared that the amendment goes too far.

I beg to bring the attention of the Senate back again to the practical question with which this amendment proposes to deal. What will it avail to adopt a provision here rendering it impossible or unlawful for any railroad company to acquire title in coal lands if you leave the condition with respect to the control just where thirty years of experience in Pennsylvania and many years of experience in West Virginia demonstrate the utter folly of such legislation?

I ask again to remind Senators of the quotation made from Governor Dawson's letter. It is plain that in West Virginia they have such a statute as Senators here say should be adopted, a statute preventing railroad companies from acquiring title or ownership in coal lands. It is plain they have such a statute there, but it is equally plain that the railroad companies have secured control through the stockholders acquiring the title and managing the coal companies for the railroad companies.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to ask the Senator a question for my own information so that I can vote intelligently upon the amendment, the principle of which, to my mind, is a sound one, namely, that railroad corporations should be kept to their legitimate business of carrying freight and passengers. If a young man in the State of Maine, for instance, upon the division of his father's estate receives in the distribution ten shares of some railroad in the State of Maine, and then goes off to the Indian Territory for the purpose of seeking his fortune, and there discovers that a private corporation is engaged in mining coal on land acquired under the provisions of this act, and for the purposes of investment and without having anything to do with the management, direction, or control of this corporation, he purchases a share of stock in that corporation, is that property to revert to the United States? Is that one of the purposes of the amendment, or is that the legitimate construction of the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am inclined to think it is, Mr. President; but I believe that this question is big enough and its importance to the people of the country is great enough to deny to individuals, here and there, even where it may involve hardship, the right of investment in stocks such as has been suggested here. Any New England son making his way to the West and investing his money there invests it with notice of what this law is, if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would premise by saying that I have much sympathy with the purpose the Senator has in view, but I would like to understand, in regard to the reversion of the title to the United States, whether or not if a party, disqualified by reason of being a stockholder in a railroad company, were to acquire an interest in a coal company in the nature of stock, what would revert to the Government, the stock or the title? That analysis of the question puzzles me somewhat.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know that I rightly understand the question of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Perhaps I can state it more precisely. The amendment, as I understand it, provides that an interest in coal lands acquired in violation of the restrictions of the amendment would revert to the Government of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose that interest was represented by stock; what would revert?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The title to the land reverts.

Mr. HEYBURN. What title? Because the title is in the corporation, and it would not be fair to carry the title of all the innumerable innocent holders in the corporation back to the United States for the sake of punishing one man. That is a difficulty I would be very glad to have the Senator explain.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I frankly confess that that raises a question to which my mind has not been before addressed, and at this moment I am not prepared to answer it. I know of no other way of reaching this question except by requiring that the title should revert. I believe that a recital in the deed, when the conveyance is made, providing against the ownership by one holding or acquiring stock in a railway company or anyone an official of a railway company or thereafter becoming an official, is the only way to reach this question.

It may be that an amendemnt providing that it should not be possible for one to acquire any valid holding in stock would reach that proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, I will suggest further this inquiry to the mind of the Senator: Where would the title that this party was incapable of taking rest? One man has sold it and received his money for it. Now, where would it go?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not understand the question asked by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would either have to remain in the party who thought he had sold it and had not because of the prohibition against the purchase of it, or it would be forfeited, perhaps.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I understand the question now; and it seems to me——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, Mr. President, I am not suggesting these questions for the purpose of embarrassing the question or the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appreciate that.

Mr. HEYBURN. But this is the time to foresee all the possible difficulties.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to have the Senator from Wisconsin elucidate his proposition on just one line.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will if I can do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I understand the amendment, it provides that neither a railway company nor any person owning any stock in any railway company can purchase coal lands. Is that correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then suppose a person is the owner of 160 acres of land, and, not having any stock in any railway company, he is to-day entitled to the land. To-morrow he either inherits stock in that company or purchases stock in the company. What becomes of his land? Does it revert to the Government? He has done no act to sell it in any way. Does it simply revert to the Government by reason of his falling heir to some stock in a railway company or by reason of his purchasing stock in such company?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think he would not, under the law, be able to acquire any right or title to any stock in a railway company that was engaged in transporting coal in that Territory.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose he gets it through inheritance or by a will, could we provide that he could not receive any such property? Would not a provision of that kind, if we attempted to make one, be absolutely unconstitutional and an interference with the laws of the State?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is possible that there are provisions embraced in this amendment which would be held by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. But I say that this question can be reached according to the demonstration made in Pennsylvania and West Virginia in the last generation of time in no other way, and I for one am anxious to take the opinion of the Supreme Court upon these questions and find out where we may legislate and in what way we may deal with this important matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to say to the Senator that while I may not be one of those who agree with his entire proposition as contained in this amendment, I think we can all well agree that a common carrier should be engaged exclusively in the business of a common carrier and no other business; but I would not wish to say that a person who happens to own stock in a common carrier, though it might not be $20 worth or $40 worth or $100 worth, should not own any other property in the United States of any kind and character—that he can not own anything else. But I rose only to see what would become of the title in the case I mentioned.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In answer to the last suggestion made by the Senator, I would simply say that he apparently recognizes, as everybody else does, that this question must be dealt with in some way to prevent the control by the railroad corporations of this country of the coal lands of the country, and yet he must know that a law which simply prohibits railway companies from becoming the owners of coal lands does not reach the question.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me right in this connection to make a suggestion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The objection of the Senator from Wisconsin to the holding of coal lands by a stockholder of a railroad I presume is predicated upon the assumption that such a holding would necessarily be in the interest of the railroad, and thus defeat the purpose of the restriction which is sought to be placed upon the railroad as to holdings.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is the history of such holdings.

Mr. BACON. That is the assumption upon which the Senator acts, and, as he says, that assumption is borne out by history. He is absolutely correct in that.

Of course the manifest hardship of prohibiting anyone who is a stockholder in a railroad from holding other property is one which commends itself to every man. The Senator himself recognizes it, and is unable to find a way in which that hardship can be avoided and at the same time this great evil eradicated.

I wish to suggest to the Senator, as I can not, under the ruling, offer an amendment, a modification which possibly he may be able to make, either now or at some other stage of the consideration of this measure, which may accomplish his purpose and at the same time avoid the great hardship which suggests itself to all Senators. I suggest to the Senator in the first line of his amendment, after the word "company," to insert the words:

Nor any person in the interest of said railroad company.

Or, if he chooses to make it broader—but of course we all understand that under the decisions of the courts "persons" embraces "corporations"—he may say "nor any person or any corporation in the interest of said railroad company;" so that it would read this way:

That no railroad company nor any person or corporation in the interest of said railway company shall acquire any right, title, interest, etc.

Then I would suggest to the Senator, in the subsequent part, after the semicolon in the third line, to add these words to make it as emphatic and as comprehensive as possible, following the word "sale:"

And said prohibition—

That is the prohibition contained in the proviso of the Senator previously recited—

And said prohibition shall extend to any person, corporation, or organization in the interest or under the control of said railroad company or other common carrier, either as agent, trustee, representative, or in any other capacity; and every contract or arrangement or device which may have the effect to give or secure, either directly or indirectly, any railroad company or other common carrier engaged in transporting coal from said lands shall be illegal and void.

Now, the purpose of that, Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Allow me to ask the Senator with reference to the last proviso, what modification he suggests there?

Mr. BACON. I would prefer to deal with those as two independent propositions, because the Senator will recognize the fact that they are absolutely separate and distinct in the principles by which they are to be controlled. In the one case there is the great principle for which the Senator contends, and for which I think he correctly contends, which I understand to be the principle recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, that a common carrier engaged in the transportation of coal should not have the opportunity to deal in coal or to compete with those who are engaged in the production of coal.

That is one great proposition; but the question as to whether any corporation shall hold over a certain amount of coal lands rests upon an altogether different principle, and a Senator might be in favor of one proposition and not of the other. For that reason I would prefer to deal with those two separately.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not have reference to the proposition limiting the holding, but to the last proviso of the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. That brings me to some comment upon inquiries which have been made of him as to what should be done in case this rule was violated. I would say that I would not favor forfeiture. I do not think that is in accord with the spirit of our laws.

Mr. SPOONER. We can not hear on this side what the Senator says.

Mr. BACON. I say I would not favor a forfeiture or a reversion. I do not think that is necessary for the accomplishment of the design, nor is it in harmony with the general spirit of our laws. There are frequent occasions where the law prohibits certain holdings by certain parties in certain interests, but it does not forfeit those holdings. Upon proper appeal to the court the law is complied with by requiring that those holdings shall be surrendered, not that the value of them shall be forfeited, but that the right to hold shall be taken away and that the party shall have the equivalent.

It strikes me that all of the suggestions which have been made here by Senators as to particular cases of hardship which would arise are met if that particular part of the amendment of the Senator is changed; if they are simply prohibited, as in the amendment which I suggested to the Senator. It seems to me that that is sufficient and for this reason: I will take an illustration. Suppose a railroad company, or some one in the interest of a railroad company, by some device were attempting to hold these coal lands for the purpose really of advancing the private scheme of the railroad company in the production of coal and in the transportation of coal to the utter destruction of all others, and it should see fit to compete in the production of coal. When the matter was brought before the court, if the court should determine that it was an illegal transaction, the court would not forfeit the property.

The railroad company would simply be required to surrender the stock, and under proper processes and through proper means that stock would be sold, and the railroad would be given the value of it, of course, and some person would necessarily be the purchaser of it the holding by whom would not be prohibited by law.

Therefore, I make this suggestion to the Senator. While I can not offer it as an amendment, and I do not know that it is a matter to be disposed of to-day, I will take the liberty of handing it to him, and I suggest to the Senator that his object can be accomplished, in my judgment, without the drastic provisions which the Senator has thought necessary in order to accomplish it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. I was only going to ask a question.

Mr. BACON. In other words, I do not think it necessary to say that no stockholder in a railroad company which is engaged in the transportation of coal shall be permitted to hold title to coal lands, because, as I formerly said, the purpose is to prevent the railroads from having the benefit of it. Therefore, if we have a particular prohibition against any person, natural or artificial, from having title or interest in these lands in the interest of a railroad company, it is the accomplishment of the purpose without that drastic and, as I conceive, unduly harsh provision of law. Now I will be glad to hear the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The question I was going to ask the Senator is only this: Does the Senator feel that there is no constitutional inhibition against the power of Congress to say to the citizen of any State, "You can not purchase such property without forfeiting or being compelled to sell other property?" Can we as a Congress provide a law that a citizen of the State of Georgia, holding stock in a railway company, can not also buy stock in a mining company or buy a mine itself? Is it certain that we have that power?

Mr. BACON. I do not know that I need follow the Senator through the tortuous line of his question, but I can make a more direct reply by saying that we are dealing exclusively here with the question of the disposition of property within a Territory and not within a State, the right to sell which and to prescribe the terms of the sale of which does rest in the sovereignty of the United States and does in no manner relate to the question of the right of the United States to prescribe upon what terms property shall be sold in a State, or who shall hold property in a State, or what citizen of a State or upon what conditions the citizen of a State can hold property. The United States undoubtedly has the right to prescribe the terms upon which this property shall be sold, and when that is said it seems to me the whole thing is said.

Here is a valuable property, and it is conceded—we are conceding it in proposing to legislate about it—that the United States Government has a right to prescribe the terms upon which the sales shall be made. Although the direct title may not be in the United States, we have the same power to deal with it as if it had. It is in the same manner that a private individual anywhere can sell property and, by certain stipulations, control the question as to what disposition can subsequently be made of that property by the vendee—as to what particular class of persons can hold the property.

Mr. McCUMBER. In this case, I want to say to the Senator, we are not dealing even with property that belongs to the United States. The title of that property is in Indian tribes.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have only a reversionary interest in case the tribe becomes extinct. Now, following our duty to dispose of this land for the benefit of the Indians of the tribe, can we place any such inhibition upon the same, even in a Territory?

Mr. BACON. The Senator's inquiry goes much further than the particular suggestion which I am making. The Senator's inquiry is one which leaves in doubt our right. Of course we had better decide that before we legislate about it at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say we have undoubtedly the right as trustees to sell under our treaties and agreements.

Mr. BACON. It is assumed that while this is the property of the Indians, it is property they can not sell, but the sale of which and the terms upon which it is to be sold are subject entirely to the control of Congress.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to know if the purpose of his suggestion of modification would relieve this difficulty, which is the main one with me. These coal lands get into the hands of a coal company in the Indian Territory who seek to develop them.

A man who happens, either by purchase or inheritance or in any other way, to own any stock, no matter how little, whether it be one share or a controlling interest, in a railroad company in the Territory which hauls coal away from those lands is prohibited by this proposed law from acquiring any interest whatever in the coal lands, which would, of course, cover the purchase of a part of the capital stock of the corporation which is operating the coal lands. Now——

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator——

Mr. KNOX. Let me fininsh the statement of what I regard the principal difficulty, and I hope the suggestion made by the Senator is intended to obviate it. This act does not forfeit the stock that the stockholder in the railroad acquired in the coal company, but it forfeits the coal company's title to land, when the stockholder may not have known anything about this transaction whatever; in other words, was an innocent purchaser.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to make a suggestion with reference to the interrogatory. The Senator from Pennsylvania has assumed that under this amendment a stockholder or officer of the railroad company would be prohibited from buying stock in a coal company.

Mr. KNOX. That is what the junior Senator from Wisconsin said in reply to my first question as to whether that was the intent of the act.

Mr. SPOONER. The language of the amendment proposed is "the person acquiring interest by purchase or lease in the land." Perhaps the amendment ought to go further.

Mr. KNOX. The purchase of a portion of the capital stock would be acquiring an interest in the land, although not technically so.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, his question was predicated upon a misunderstanding so far as my amendment is concerned.

Mr. KNOX. I ask the Senator if his amendment cures that?

Mr. BACON. The purpose is to cure it. In other words, the purpose of the amendment is to eliminate from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin the feature which prohibits the holding by a stockholder or any person or any other corporation, unless it be some one acting in the interest of the railroad company. The Senator will perceive that it does not relate to any stockholder unless that stockholder is acting in the interest, either direct or indirect, of a railroad company engaged in the transportation of coal.

Mr. KNOX. I perceive the difference, and I think the suggestion is a very wise one, because that objection to the amendment should certainly be eliminated.

Mr. BACON. I think that is the radical objection to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. It is the fact that the person who might be a stockholder in a railroad company might have an interest in the coal land and be in no wise connected in so doing in any interest of the railroad company. On the other hand, some person not a stockholder in the railroad company could still hold stock in the coal company in the interest of the railroad company. So the Senator's amendment, as it now stands, could easily be evaded.

But the purpose is to affect no one in the holding of coal lands unless that holding is in the interest of the railroad company. In order to make that provision effective the amendment which I suggest goes on to make that holding an illegal holding if by any arrangement or by any device that is the effect of the holding of that person.

At the same time it entirely destroys the objectionable feature which would prohibit a stockholder of the railroad company from having stock in the coal company although he might not be so holding in the interest of the railroad company, but entirely in his own interest. I simply suggest that to the Senator. As I said, it is possible that this may not be finally determined this afternoon, and I would be glad to give it to him for such consideration as he may think proper to give to it. I was interrupted before I had entirely finished my reply to the Senator's inquiry as to the subsequent provision, the last proviso of the Senator's amendment, which is in these words:

And provided further, That upon violation of any of said conditions all right, title, and interest in and to said lands shall revert to and vest in the United States in trust for the tribes of Indians now owning the same, and the tribal organization is hereby continued in so far as may be necessary to execute the condition hereby created.

I would not have that provision for the reason that the only purpose of the amendment is to have an effective amendment to prevent a railroad company from holding title to any of these coal lands or to prevent any other person, either artificial or natural, from holding any of the coal lands in the interest of the railroad company. When that is accomplished it is not necessary, it seems to me, to have a penalty attached. It is sufficient if there is the machinery in the courts, and every lawyer knows there would be machinery in the courts under this provision, to say to a railroad company, "You shall not hold this title; you shall not have this stock; you shall not have control of this coal company, but I will appoint a receiver and I will have that sold at public outcry; I will give you back the money that it may bring, and then you are acquit of the whole subject, and somebody may hold the title of the coal land who will not be interested in the transportation of its industry in that way in an unfair position for competition with other producers and for the destruction of competing interests."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I very much appreciate the value of this discussion. I am fortunate, indeed, in having offered an amendment here, whatever inherent weakness it may have, which has developed that this subject is of primary importance, and has interested the ablest lawyers of this body in endeavoring to work out in some form, better than I have suggested, a means of disposing of this important question.

Sir, I venture now to ask unanimous consent that the matter may go over for to-day in order that there may be opportunity to perfect an amendment which will not be subject to constitutional objection, and yet will deal no less effectively and completely with the subject.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should be disposed to request unanimous consent for this reason: I think that it is evident to anyone who has watched this matter that it is the general purpose of the Senate now, if it can ever get to a vote upon it, to strike out the Senate committee amendment to section 13 and also a part of House section 13. We have exhausted the day upon a question which I believe nearly everyone will agree will be practically eliminated from this bill, and, for one, I feel disposed to object to a further continuance of it, except upon a vote of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make no pretense to any special knowledge concerning these Indian matters; I do not rise to discuss any feature of the bill that is under consideration; but an hour ago a letter was handed to me, which came through the mail with a special-delivery stamp upon it, so that I presume it has not been sent to other Senators. It is from a gentleman who has taken a great interest heretofore, and does now, in all matters relating to Indians, and I ask that the letter may be read at the desk. I trust the chairman of the committee will give it such consideration as its merits may justify.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that, at the instance of the Senator from Missouri, I think the suggestions contained in the letter have all been carefully safeguarded, or provision will be made for safeguarding them, when we get to the nineteenth section.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator, without objection, simply allow the letter to be printed in the RECORD? That is all I ask.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be printed in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I respectfully call your careful attention to certain portions of the bill H. R. 5976 pending in the Senate entitled: "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes."

Certain amendments to the bill added by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs would indicate, from their nature, that they were not fully understood.

Section 19 of the bill is amended in part as follows:

"* * * Provided further, That when restrictions upon the alienation and leasing of lands have been, are hereby, or may hereafter be removed, said lands are alienable from the date of selection thereof.

"* * * And as to all leases and conveyances heretofore made by any member of either of the Five Civilized Tribes whose restrictions as to alienation are removed by this act, of or upon lands other than homesteads, and which said leases and conveyances have been heretofore filed in the office of the United States Indian agent for the Union Agency at Muscogee, or with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Secretary of the Interior, it shall not be necessary to have the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. And no lease heretofore made shall be declared invalid solely on the ground that it was not acknowledged."

Sections 15 and 16 of the agreement made with the Cherokee tribe, approved July 1, 1902, provide for alienation of the lands allotted to members of the tribe, a portion of which is not alienable for five years from the date of the approval of the patent to issue by the Government to the allottee, so that several years will yet elapse before all these lands are alienable by the allottees under said agreement. Freedmen were given the right to alienate their allotments about one year after the date of the agreement above referred to, but it should be borne in mind that all conveyances were required to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before becoming valid. There are probably 3,500 freedmen in the Cherokee Nation.

Likewise section 7 of the Creek agreement, approved March 1, 1901, restricts the alienation of lands allotted, and contains the saving clause of previous approval by the Secretary to enable the allottee to convey a good title.

The Choctaw and Chickasaw agreement of June 28, 1898, provides in a similar manner for the protection of the allottees in the disposition of their allotments.

The greatest threatened wrong contained in the proposed legislation lies in the provision that the date of legal alienation by the allottee shall revert to the day the allottee selected his allotment, not the time restrictions may have been removed, or the date of the approval of the allotment, or the day upon which the Secretary may have approved of any sale made after authority of law was granted to dispose of certain portions of the land.

Scarcely less subject to criticism is the clause providing that no lease shall be declared invalid solely on the ground that it is not acknowledged.

Two years ago, when an investigation of the affairs in Indian Territory was being made, it was found that all sorts of schemes were being resorted to in the wild effort to secure title to Indian lands, some of the operators being so bold as to defy the authority of the Government in carrying out its preventive measures to secure protection for the Indians.

Various conveyances were secured at that time and previous thereto and filed with the United States Indian agent at Muscogee, or with the Secretary of the Interior, which were altogether void by reason of having no authority of law. These conveyances stipulated for transfer of ownership in the lands by the allottee for a trifling consideration, not at all commensurate with the real value of the lands, and the most daring manipulations and fraudulent practices were resorted to in the effort to accomplish the results sought for. I recall that in many cases it was found that a purported lease contract contained a clause whereby the title to the lands leased was conveyed to the lessee at the termination of the lease, the annual amount of rental stipulated to be paid being the consideration for title in fee simple.

It is now proposed to legalize these contracts of lease and sale by a law of Congress, and great pressure is evidently being brought to bear to accomplish this result.

It is alleged that the Bradley Investment Company, of Muscogee, alone has perhaps 500 contracts of lease and sale, involving 100,000 acres of allotted lands. Many other companies and private speculators are engaged in similar work, and no doubt all have brought their influence to bear in an effort to have a statute enacted to profit by their unconscionable transactions with these Indians.

The other provision noted, whereby no acknowledgment shall be required to validate the conveyance, is the worst sort of legislation.

In a new country like Indian Territory it seems of the utmost importance that conveyances of realty should be guarded by formalities of great legal solemnity, in order that fraud shall not be committed. Not only are the illegal purchasers of allotted lands seeking to secure this legislation, but railroad companies are alleged to be deeply interested in quieting title to lands that the courts have so far refused to sanction, on account of gross irregularities in the execution of the conveyances from the Indians.

I understand that the honorable Secretary of the Interior is opposed to the legislation referred to in this communication.

May I not hope that after a careful investigation of this matter you will see your way clear to oppose the legislation which has been referred to herein?

Very respectfully,

S. M. BROSIUS,
Agent Indian Rights Association.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to object to this matter going over until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAPP. I would not object to section 13 going over long enough for us to dispose of section 19, which is still pending.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I ask unanimous consent that that be done, that we pass over section 13 for the time being.

Mr. CLAPP. Until we dispose of section 19. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I infer from the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin that he does not desire to-day to further discuss the amendment to section 13.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator that I desire at as early a time as possible to make this amendment effective by modification, if it is objectionable for constitutional reasons, and, if possible, to do so this afternoon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I so understand the Senator, but it seems to me that that should not preclude a further consideration of the section to which the amendment is directed by Senators who have not had the opportunity to express themselves in regard to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Such discussion will not in any way interfere with the perfection of the Senator's amendment. It is not necessary, in order to have time for that purpose, that we should suspend consideration of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But my request for unanimous consent was merely to pass over this amendment for the time being. When we return to it, it will, of course, be open to discussion and amendment throughout, as it now is.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin has finished the discussion of the section, as I infer he has from his statement——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield the floor to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire for a few minutes to consider this question from the general standpoint. There is no more important question before this Senate than the one involved in this amendment or in the section proposed to be amended. There is no greater evil to-day in the United States than that involved in the existing control of common carriers over the utilities of life.

Mr. President, productive industry and the functions of a common carrier should be kept so distinctly apart that neither would control the other. If productive industry controls the railroads, they do it for their selfish interests; if the railroads control productive industry, they do it for their selfish interests. It may be difficult to find a remedy for this evil; but it is the greatest evil to-day existing in the business world. No railroad should be engaged in any other business than that of a common carrier; no productive industry should have such a grasp upon the common carriers of the country that they can control them. Take the producers of iron and steel and iron and steel products of this country and allow them to control the transportation as a matter of personal accommodation to them, to the exclusion of those whom they may choose to exclude, you paralyze competition and you place this industry in the hands of the controlling force.

Take these coal lands. Perhaps we shall never find a cure in our generation for the evil that exists in the older States; but we can at least scotch it as it approaches and threatens the new civilization of our country in these Territories; and we should direct our attention to it. We can only draw conclusions of wisdom perhaps from the things of the past or from conditions that are beyond our reach to-day; but we should not fail to draw those conclusions for the benefit of a correct solution of the difficulties that confront us in this case.

Here are, perhaps in extent and in character, as valuable coal lands as there are in the world. We are proposing to sell or lease them for the best price and upon the most favorable conditions for the benefit of these Indians. If we sell enough or lease enough of those coal lands to the railroads to enable those railroads to supply the market, the remainder of the coal lands will have no value whatever. Private investment is not going into the field to compete with the railroads in mining and selling coal in the general market, unless you can reach that much-to-be-desired point of preventing discrimination in freight rates on the part of the railroads, by which to-day in the State of Wyoming, where the railroads own vast and valuable coal fields, coal lands that are not owned by the railroads have no market and individual ownership of those coal lands is to-day without any possible realization.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator allow me to make a correction in his statement?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is true that in the State of Wyoming great quantities of coal lands are held by public corporations. We have 30,000 square miles of coal in the State of Wyoming. Some of the common carriers of that State are engaged in coal mining. We have, however, other coal-mining industries there, and very great ones, in addition to those that are connected in any way with any railroad or carrying corporation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I accept the statement of the Senator from Wyoming as being true within the limitations that I know to exist. We deal with the coal of Wyoming. I cited it as an instance, in no invidious sense, but because we draw our coal supplies from those mines, and we know something of the restrictions upon our rights in a business way that flow from the management of those mines. We know that halfway between the coal mines in Wyoming and our mines there are other coal fields that, with the same development, would produce the same character of coal and the same quantity of it; and we also know that because of the interest which the railroad company and those connected with it have in these mines in Wyoming, we can not secure either the accommodations for transportation or such rates as would enable us to deliver our coal to our market for the same price that they deliver the coal from their mines. We know that as a matter of fact. There is nothing in this legislation that can possibly effect a cure of that evil; but we must draw our lessons of wisdom from the experiences of life around us; and I cited it only as an instance.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I agree with the Senator in his desire to prevent railway companies engaged in hauling coal from owning coal mines and selling the product; but I wish to ask the Senator does he think that that could be prevented without at the same time preventing the stockholder in a railroad company being interested in coal mines?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that it can.

Mr. FULTON. The same conditions probably would prevail against which the Senator objects. We all know that——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is true and perhaps——

Mr. FULTON. But what I want to ask the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. Excuse me. Perhaps by some method of circumvention the law would be evaded, but we will try to stop those leaks as they occur.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he thinks we could prohibit the stockholders in a railroad corporation from investing their own money in coal lands?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think so. I think as a matter of law we could not do it. I do not believe that the power of the Government could be extended that far.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator whether he has examined the decision of the Supreme Court on this coal question, which was rendered a few days since—the case of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. In that case the court holds:

> The question, therefore, to be decided is this: Has a carrier engaged in interstate commerce the power to contract to sell and transport in completion of the contract the commodity sold when the price stipulated in the contract does not pay the cost of purchase, the cost of delivery, and the published freight rates?

In this case the Supreme Court held, I think, with unanimity that the railroad company could not engage in such business. I believe therein lies our remedy, and in the bill that is either before us or which is coming before us soon. That would not, of course, apply perhaps to coal in a State, but the States could themselves handle that within their jurisdiction the same as the General Government can within its jurisdiction. So it is within the power of the General Government or of the States to prevent these corporations from doing this to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have not doubted for a moment at any time that a corporation would be limited to the powers conferred by its charter, and all transportation companies, so far as I have had occasion to know about them, are by the terms of their charters confined to that class of business, but it is rather a question with us of affording an opportunity for the evasion, the easy evasion, of the law in this case.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not the Senator of the opinion that there lies confronting us a solution of this proposition which will be quite incapable of evasion, and the only one which can be devised which will not be susceptible of evasion; and that is, that the United States shall hold these lands in trust and shall not sell them at all, but shall hold them and lease them, retaining such control over the lease as the lessor may lawfully retain, and thus in this way paying over to the Indians the annually accruing royalty and preventing any possibility of the concentration of these lands in corporate ownership or under corporate control? Is not that the way to do it?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that a remedy lies in that direction; but here is a difficulty that we must meet in connection with that remedy: It was stated here by a Senator this morning, I think, that about 60 per cent of the leases that have been made have been transferred to the railroad companies, thus giving them indirectly the advantage they would have by purchase.

Mr. SPOONER. That was very wisely brought to the attention of the Senate; but nothing would be easier than for Congress, in providing for the leasing of these lands, to make the leases nonassignable; to provide that they shall be assignable only upon the approval of the President of the United States, or to provide that they shall be only assignable upon the approval of Congress. If the people can not, in the last analysis, trust this body and the other body and the President, our institutions do not amount to much.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in entire accord with the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the manner in which these lands should be disposed of. I have never believed in placing the Indian lands beyond the reach of the Government. I am opposed to a system of government that ties up public lands either that they may be leased by the Government or controlled by it. I believe in the Government selling these lands, but I believe in the Government, in the execution of a trust of this kind, adopting the policy best adapted to perpetuate the benefits to the cestui que trust.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether the purpose sought to be accomplished by him would not be realized simply by the rejection of the Senate committee amendment to section 13?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; and the modification of the House provision.

Mr. HEYBURN. Which would necessitate the modification of other parts of the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that the original House bill provided for just such leases as the Senator from Wisconsin contemplates.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment of the Senate committee in a measure cuts out certain provisions of the House bill that would necessarily be restored if we are going to treat these lands from the standpoint of leasing them.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; the amendment of the Senate committee to the bill cuts out all of section 13 of the House bill, which provided:

That all coal and asphalt lands, whether leased or unleased, shall be reserved from sale under this act until the existing leases for coal and asphalt lands shall have expired—and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease the residue of the unleased coal and asphalt lands for mining purposes under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him.

Then—

But not to sell them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I wish to ask whether, if we leave section 13 as the House enacted it, that would not accomplish the purpose sought by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. If it is left, we should want to add some provisions restricting the assignment and transfer of leases, and all that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should say, Mr. President, that section 13 of the House bill does not go far enough. It states a general principle of action, but it does not sufficiently safeguard it against the very evils from which we are seeking to protect against in this case. The section, if restored to the bill in lieu of the Senate committee amendment, should contain a limitation as to the time of the leases, the quantity of lands that might be leased, and the provision suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin as to the assignability of the leases. Of course we gain nothing; we throw no protection about these people if we allow these leases to be made and then to be assigned at the will and pursuant to the connivance of those who desire to monopolize the land; but if the leases are nonassignable, if the contracts are of sufficient size to justify the expenditure incident to the opening of a coal mine so as to make it an attractive investment, we shall then have drawn to that country, instead of one great monopoly to mine coal, hundreds and hundreds of operators, who will represent an element of healthy competition and also diversified investments from various sections of the country and under various conditions. The more men who are engaged in mining coal in that section, each on his own account, the better for the country. It is much better that those coal lands should be developed by a hundred different combinations of capital than that they should be developed by one, for we shall thereby get the element of competition.

Mr. President, I think there is no more important question before the Senate than this; and this is the time when it must be settled. If we treat this question lightly and give authority under this act to sell those coal lands, it will be but a short time when one railroad, or a combination of railroads acting in harmony, will own them all, operate them all, place its own price upon the product of the mines, and say to others who would invest in them, who would engage in the enterprise, "If you do it, you will do it against our secret rebates with those who are intimately associated with us in financial affairs; you will do it at the risk of being able to detect us in the subterranean arrangements which we will have with our stockholders or with those who are acting in sympathy with us."

The consequence will be that private enterprise will be kept out not only of the field of operation, but out of the field of purchase. It will not go in there any more than it will take hold of the coal lands to which I have referred earlier in my remarks.

I have been there; I have known them nearly thirty years, as fine coal measures as are to be found in any country, utterly and absolutely without value because they have no available market, and there is no railroad that will give them a rate or haul their product, and they are hundreds of miles from any possible competing line. So it will be here in this new country, where there are now but two roads available on which to carry that coal to the market, and those two roads are acting in concert, making their own rates, and making such rates as are prohibitive of competition.

Mr. President, I hope that we shall not, because of any pressure for time, allow this measure to go without that full consideration and this bill to be enacted without that careful amendment that will surely accomplish the purpose of protecting these lands against the spoiler.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I think, if it has developed nothing else, the discussion has developed the fact that the Senate is not prepared at this time to legislate in regard to these lands in definite form. The committee was of that opinion; and in the amendment which the committee proposed it was provided that nothing should be done either toward the sale or the lease of these coal lands until March, 1907, allowing one year in which the Senate could make its investigations, and then it provided that if it was determined to sell these lands they should be sold under certain restrictions mentioned in section 13. That has been extended for five years further.

The discussion, however, has developed along such lines and has created such a deep impression that we are more intensely ignorant of the conditions in the Territory than we even thought. If the opportunity shall offer, I shall make a suggestion that the Senate recede from its amendment, or ask that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the committee entirely. I would make that motion now were it not for the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the committee amendment is still pending and he may desire a vote upon that amendment. But whenever the time shall come I shall make a motion for that disposition of this section. That, of course, would restore the House section which, by the Senate committee amendment, is proposed to be stricken out. Then I shall propose that the House section shall be modified so as to read substantially as follows:

SEC. 13. That all coal and asphalt lands, whether leased or unleased, shall be reserved from sale under this act until the existing leases for coal and asphalt lands shall have expired, or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law.

That eliminates, so far as this session of Congress is concerned, any affirmative legislation in regard to the disposal of these lands either by lease or otherwise, and leaves each of those questions to the future consideration of Congress, upon such data and upon such information as they may be able to acquire between now and the time when we may be called to act in regard to these lands, either by leasing them or selling them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have observed, Mr. President, in this debate a good deal of adverse sentiment regarding Government ownership of anything, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to two inconsistencies in the actual legislation of this body and the House of Representatives with that sentiment. The other day the Secretary of War recommended the purchase of coal fields in the island of Batan in the Philippine Islands. Why? There was coal in Japan that could be secured; there was coal elsewhere in the Philippine Islands, in the island of Cebu, that could be secured. But it was claimed that this coal was about as good as the Japanese coal, and could be mined and sold at a cheaper price than could the Japanese coal; that it was superior to other coals in the Philippine Islands; that we had a navy and an army there, and that we had a budding merchant marine there all needing coal. What did we do in this Senate when that bill for the purchase of the coal fields in Batan came here? We passed it unanimously, I believe, just as they passed it in the House of Representatives.

It is true there was some question in the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives as to what should be done with those coal fields after they were acquired by the United States Government, and Secretary Taft, in his hearing before that committee, suggested that it was not the intention of the Government to go into the business of coal mining, but that after it had acquired the coal fields it could then lease them to operators and would retain, just as is suggested here, with reference to the coal lands of the public domain, a control that would prevent extortionate prices. So Congress has already acted almost unanimously in the line of government ownership.

There is another instance of stupendous Government ownership entered into with the almost unanimous approval of both bodies. In the first place we purchased a canal, a partially constructed canal, owned by the French Canal Company. We paid $40,000,000 for it, and we are now engaged in completing that canal at a probable cost of anywhere from two hundred million to five hundred million dollars.

Why are we building that canal? To promote foreign and interstate commerce. If we can build the Panama Canal, can we not build an interstate railway? And if we do not wish to enter into the Government ownership of railroads, can we not at all events incorporate interstate railroads? The Senator from Wisconsin interjects that nobody denies that. Yet I hear it frequently denied upon this floor that we have a constitutional right to pass a law for the purpose of organizing interstate railroads, and I am glad to know that I have obtained the Senator's opinion, great lawyer as he is, in favor of the proposition that the United States Government has complete and ample power to pass a national incorporation act for the construction and operation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

We have not only entered upon the construction of the canal, but we have entered into the ownership of a railroad with the almost unanimous consent of both parties—the Panama Railroad. We have bought all the stock of that railroad, the company being organized under the laws of New York. At first we did not secure all the stock. We only had a part of it. What did we propose to do then? To exercise the power of eminent domain in order to get the rest.

When we found we did not have all the stock of the Panama Railroad Company what did the Senate conclude to do? The Senate, that is so sensitive about Government ownership, passed a bill providing for the condemnation, not of the railroad itself, with its location in Panama, but for the condemnation of stock held by private persons in the United States in a New York corporation which owned the Panama Railroad, and it was the unanimous opinion of the great lawyers of the Senate that that could be done.

What solution of the entire question of national ownership is suggested by this action? It is that the nation may condemn the common stock of all the railroad companies of the country, subect to their liabilities in bonds and preferred stock. We can thus in a very short time obtain control of the great corporate railroad systems of the country, and the Senate has blazed a way toward an easy solution of this question of Government ownership. We could thus solve the question of operation and administration, for the managers and operators would still remain at their posts, just as they do in the Panama Railroad, and time could be taken to perfect administration.

Unless we do legislate in the line of national incorporation, do you think the people are going to be insensible to the fact that there is an easy way of acquiring every railroad in the country by the condemnation simply of its common stock, and that we can issue bonds for the purchase of that stock at a low rate of interest, and that the dividends on the stock itself would take care of the bonds and constitute a sinking fund for their retirement and pay the bonds off within a period of thirty years?

I insist upon it there are but two propositions before the country—either a complete control of the railroad system of the country by national incorporation, or through national ownership acquired in the method I have indicated, and which has the sanction of the ablest lawyers of the Senate.

Let me call attention to another abuse that exists to-day, referred to by a memorandum which has been sent to me, like the other one, from the gallery, with reference to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company. It gives the history of their control over coal fields, and it says:

> The Reading Railroad controls the anthracite coal fields through the medium of the Temple Iron Company, which obtained a blanket charter about 1790, authorizing it to make pig iron, buy coal and coal lands, and operate them, etc. When President Baer was the corporation attorney of the Reading Railway, before coming to the head of the company, he learned of the unusually broad terms of the Temple Iron Company's charter and purchased a controlling interest in that company's stock. The Temple Iron Company, originally a small local corporation, operating a single pig-iron plant, has thus become practically the sole owner of the Pennsylvania anthracite fields.

And, remember, one-sixth of the stock of the Reading Company is owned by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and a considerable portion, I think, is owned, either directly or indirectly, by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the New York Central Railroad Company. What a field this offers for Government ownership, for it will be contended that by condemning in the courts merely the common stock of these three great trunk lines the nation will obtain not only the control of the railway systems, but the absolute control of the anthracite field of the country.

So I insist upon it to the Senators who are so sensitive about Government ownership that they will find themselves confronted with these serious questions unless they now, within the near future, adopt an adequate system of national incorporation and control, which will permit the greater sovereign to do, through its own instrumentalities, the greater sovereign's business, and which will not submit that business to corporations created by single States, whose lax legislation results in such abuses as have been accomplished through these holding companies in West Virginia and in Pennsylvania—such companies as the Reading Company.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we have spent more than one day in the discussion of this bill, which I think all admit, as it is now amended, neither branch of Congress will pass. We have provided for five years in which to consider the subject of the disposition of those lands. I know of no necessity, therefore of crossing that bridge until we reach it at that time, or nearly that time, if we need that much more time to inform ourselves of the subject-matter.

I do not want to shut off any debate on this particular amendment, and would not do so if I did not think the debate that has been going on is more applicable to the general railway rate legislation that we are having under discussion from day to day; but in order to get through with this bill, I move that the amendment of the committee to section 13, together with the proposed amendments to that amendment, be laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY. Does that include the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. Necessarily the laying of one amendment on the table takes all of them and disposes of that question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota moves to lay the amendment of the committee to section 13 on the table.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, can not those questions be separated? There is one distinct amendment proposed to this bill by the Committee on Indian Affairs. There is an amendment offered to that amendment. It strikes me that the question can be separated. The Senator from North Dakota moves to lay both the amendment offered by the committee and the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin on the table.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the amendment to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from North Dakota moves to lay the committee amendment on the table, the Chair is of the opinion that would carry all pending amendments. Does the Chair understand distinctly the motion of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. My motion was to lay the amendment proposed by the committee upon the table, which would carry with it all amendments to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MALLORY. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). While I do not suppose that pairs will prevail on this vote, yet the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], with whom I have a general pair, asked to have the pair preserved on this bill. As he is absent, I can not vote. If he were here, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Montana (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. Therefore I withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Owing to my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is absent, I withhold my vote. I should vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KEAN (when Mr. FORAKER's name was called). The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is detained from the Chamber to-day on account of illness, I regret to state.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. I therefore ask to be excused from voting.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], who is detained from the Chamber by illness. Therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PATTERSON. Has the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. PATTERSON. He and I are paired, and for that reason I will not vote.

Mr. CLAY (after having voted in the negative). I desire to ask whether the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CLAY. I have a pair with that Senator, and I withdraw my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to inquire whether this motion, if it is carried, will leave section 13 as it passed the House?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will leave section 13 as it passed the House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And subject to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And subject to amendment.

Mr. LATIMER (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to ask if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. LATIMER. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] is paired with my colleague [Mr. TALIAFERRO], who is not present. I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. The Senator from West Virginia and I have transferred our pairs and will vote, leaving my colleague paired with the senior Senator from Vermont. I vote "nay."

Mr. SCOTT. I vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is absent. I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Georgia we will change pairs and I will vote.

Mr. CLAY. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. SPOONER. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLAY. I vote "nay."

So the amendment of the committee to section 13 was laid on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that the vote just taken restores the House provision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move to amend section 13 by inserting, after the word "expired," in line 6, the words "or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law;" and further by striking out the balance of the section; so that the section as amended will read:

SEC. 13. That all coal and asphalt lands, whether leased or unleased, shall be reserved from sale under this act until the existing leases for coal and asphalt lands shall have expired, or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objections to the amendment, and unless some member of the committee raises an objection there is no objection to it on the part of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, section 13, after the word "expired," strike out the remainder of the section and insert "or until such time as may be otherwise provided by law."

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if that would still leave the land subject to be leased?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; it takes it entirely out. The land could not be leased.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it in order now to offer an amendment to section 19?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is now in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the amendment I offer may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 27 strike out all of section 19 and insert:

SEC. 19. That all restrictions upon alienations and leasing of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes of less than full blood are, except as to homesteads, hereby removed; that no full-blood Indian of any of said tribes, or his full-blood heirs, shall have power to alienate, sell, dispose of, or incumber in any manner any of the lands allotted to him for a period of twenty-five years from and after the passage and approval of this act, unless such restriction shall, prior to the expiration of said period, be removed by act of Congress: Provided, however, That such full-blood Indians of any of said tribes may lease any lands other than homesteads under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and in case of the inability of any full-blood owner of a homestead, on account of infirmity or age, to work or farm his homestead, the Secretary of the Interior, upon proof of such inability, may authorize the leasing of such homestead under such rules and regulations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the understanding is that that amendment shall apply after the word "allottee," on line 20, of page 27. It was drawn before the other amendments were made.

Now, Mr. President, this is a most important amendment not only as it affects the lives of the Indians, but particularly as it refers to the future prospect of all our Indian tribes in the Indian Territory. I wish to speak very briefly of the object of this amendment.

The history of the American people in its dealings with the Indian tribes in the United States gives a degree of solemnity to that often-quoted phrase that our Pilgrim fathers, when they landed in this country, first fell upon their knees and then upon the aborigines. While the descendants of those Pilgrim fathers may have forgotten the first lesson of their fathers, I think they have never forgotten the second lesson, for we have continued to fall upon these tribes of Indians from the date of the earlier settlements until the present time.

We forced the Indians from the Atlantic shore. We pressed them on beyond the Alleghenies. We followed them on over the Blue Ridge. We crowded them into the valleys of the Ohio. We pressed them onward again through the Mississippi Valley. We crowded them to the Mississippi River and to Minnesota, and even when that immortal poet was writing his beautiful poem of the immortal Minnehaha, we were pressing them from their old hunting grounds in that place. We crowded them then beyond the plains of the Dakotas, and still on across the Missouri, and over the Rocky Mountains, until we have brought them to the western coast.

Now, Mr. President, in all of the crowding of these Indian tribes we never awakened up to any public conscience on what should be done with the few remnant tribes of the Indians until we got them so far from us that those who controlled the Government relative to the Indians were not influenced at all by the Caucasian race that was crowding them out of their old hunting grounds. It exemplifies the old proposition that "distance lends enchantment to the view."

Finally our conscience was pricked to the extent that, in 1834, we did say "We will take a little section of the United States, and we will set it aside for the Indian tribes of this country;" that they are entitled to at least one-fiftieth or one hundredth of the land which was once entirely their own. We placed them in the boundary line of what was known as the "Indian Territory" in 1834. The intention at that time was to make an Indian territory out of that section of the country. We selected as fine land for hunting, for grazing, for agriculture as can be found anywhere in the United States. Our intention was good at the time.

Finally the white settlers crowded along around the border lines of this Territory, and the white man has never yet recognized that the aborigines of any country on the face of the earth that was not white had any title or any rights to the country which he was bound in the slightest degree to respect.

The whole sentiment of our people whenever they came in contact with the retreating Indians was that "You must retreat farther; you have no valid claim to this fair country against the white man's civilization; you have no right to stop the progress of western civilization and western settlement by claiming one foot of your ancient territory." But when we placed them there we felt at least that we had given them a piece of land that was all their own, and a section of the country wherein they could develop and live as Indians or be educated and live as white people if they saw fit.

What happened but a short time after we had located them there? And, Mr. President, we did not locate them all there at their own will and pleasure. We crowded them out of the States of Georgia and Mississippi and other places and we fenced them within the border lines of this new Territory. Then we said to them: "You may here follow out your own development, and we will protect you and shield you against the white man. We will shield you against ourselves." But the moment the white man reached that border line he demanded that the Indian should remove. So he came to Congress. He went before the tribes of Indians themselves; and if there is anything on the face of the earth which demonstrates that the Indian will never learn to take care of himself wholly it is the fact that after two hundred and fifty years of history, knowing the contaminating influence of white civilization upon the Indian himself, he was led to believe, lured into the belief by the superior intellect of the white men, that it would be beneficial to him if he would allow them to cross over the border line and become a part of their citizenship. The Indians consented. We made the necessary laws. The result was that in less than thirty years we had demoralized the Indian. We had practically taken possession of his country and made of him a pauper.

Mr. President, we have but these few remnants of the people left, and I confess that my sentiment joins with my sense of justice in announcing that there is a duty upon the Government of the United States to protect those few remnants of full-blood Indians in the Indian Territory if it is possible to do so.

Our error has been in attempting to do something that was impossible in all of our history, and that is to make a white man out of an Indian; to so educate him, as we claimed, that he could compete in the business or professional enterprises of the world with the white civilization. That was one of our first errors, and an error that we ourselves seem never to have learned.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. When you found that it could not be done in any other way, you did it by act of Congress?

Mr. McCUMBER. We attempted to do it by act of Congress. We have been governing those Indians since 1834, and I think every Senator will agree with me that a worse governed Territory was never known in the world than has been the government of the Indian Territory.

They have been subject to such influences of the people who were trying to use them and rob them upon the one hand, and we have been so far from them that we did not understand their needs upon the other, that we have been making legislation upon conditions that we knew nothing about, and we have coupled up by making legislation in an ignorant way by attempting to make a white man out of the Indian. The very most that we can ever hope to do with the Indian tribes is not to make white men out of them, but it is to make the best possible Indians that we can out of them.

The Indian is improvident. I never say one yet—a full-blood Indian I am speaking of now—who had any property which could be sold that a white man could not obtain in six months for one-half of its value, if he stayed by him long enough and tried to impress him with the necessity of selling it. Wherever we have given the Indian the right to sell his land, he has sold it. Not only that, but I am informed to-day by some of the best authority from the Indian Territory that for a bottle of whisky up to $5 there are hundreds of thousands of claims that have been already sold subject to the possibility that Congress might ratify those previous sales.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not want to take the Senator's time, for he is in the midst of a very honest, frank, and straightforward speech.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to ask the Senator if all these hundreds of thousands of arrangements for sales by the Indians for whisky, without the consent or approval of the Secretary of the Interior, are not validated by this bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is just the point I was going to make. When I placed the number at 100,000, it was undoubtedly excessive. I am giving the same statement the party gave to me.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will yield a moment, at the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] it is proposed to strike out that provision.

Mr. WARNER. I supposed the Senator from North Dakota understood that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was going to say that the provision has since been stricken out——

Mr. WARNER. No; it is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is proposed at least to be stricken out. I understand that.

Now, Mr. President, we have passed the kind of laws I have stated. I think we have made treaties with the Seminoles that there shall be no restrictions on some of their lands. So have treaties been made with others that the restriction shall expire within a certain time; with still others that it shall expire in a little longer time; with still others that it shall remain for twenty-one years, I think. So there are several different laws fixing restrictions upon the sale of their lands which shall be allotted to them.

In a great many instances they have attempted to sell the lands, whether homestead or otherwise, despite the restrictions, and for almost nothing. Can we not say with almost absolute certainty that if you give them the power of sale, within a few months all of the property will be transferred from the Indian to white settlers, and transferred for whatever the white settler sees fit to give them?

Can we change this by law at the present time? It is a serious question, Mr. President, but it is one which I believe can be answered in the affirmative. I do not care to go into the legal proposition unless it is challenged, but my proposition is that so long as——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think, in view of the lateness of the hour and the suggestion of the Senator, unless some member of the committee objects, the chairman of the committee will be disposed to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not take one moment of the time in arguing it if I thought there would be a general acceptance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to cooperate with the chairman of the committee in facilitating the passage of the pending bill. I would be delighted if it could be done this evening; but, if the Senator from North Dakota will indulge me a moment, I wish to say that I think this question ought to be discussed and considered by the Senate. It is one of the most important features of the measure. I am not in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, nor am I in favor of the provision as it came from the House.

I desire to move that the entire section of the bill as it came from the other House and the amendment proposed by the Senate committee be stricken out, so as to leave the restrictions upon the alienation exactly as they are now under existing law.

Mr. SPOONER. Those restrictions can be removed under existing law.

Mr. STONE. Yes; they can be removed under existing law as to full bloods—those having Indian blood. Under existing law, as I understand, the restrictions upon intermarriage with whites and freedmen, except as to homesteads——

Mr. McCUMBER. No; this amendment only affects full bloods.

Mr. STONE. I know this amendment does. I said under the present law there is no restriction upon the alienation of the surplus lands by white men or by freedmen.

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. STONE. There is a restriction under treaties made between the Government and the Indians as to the alienation of their surplus or unallotted lands in the case of Indians of full blood or of citizens having Indian blood.

The Senator from Wisconsin asks me what the restriction is. On the Cherokees it is five years from the date of their patent; that is, the Cherokee Indians can sell their present surplus or unallotted lands in five years after they shall have received their patents.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. STONE. Yes. The restrictions put upon homesteads of course continue.

In the case of the Choctaws and the Chickasaws they may sell one-fourth of their land after one year from the date of issuance of their patent, one-fourth in three years, and the remainder in five years. The Seminoles may sell after March 4, 1906, and the Creeks in five years from the date of the approval of the supplemental agreement made in 1902. That is carried to 1907, and then they can sell.

I believe, Mr. President, that that law ought not to be disturbed, or that policy departed from which was entered upon years ago under a solemn compact entered into between the Government of the United States and these Indian tribes, under which these lands were allotted, and the Indians consented to accept their lands in severalty and to break up their tribal relations and enter into other relations to the Government of the United States. I should like to be heard somewhat on that question before the Senate finally decides it.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator not think that to leave these lands without restriction upon alienation as to the full-blood Indian would be practically making him the prey of the white man, and that to a certainty within a very short time he would lose his homestead?

Mr. STONE. I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. McCUMBER. Not at all. I am entirely willing to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I desire to say, in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], that there are about 90,000 people in the Five Civilized Tribes who are called citizens of those tribes. About 24,000 of them, according to a statement made by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes—I suppose he gets his information from the rolls which have been prepared—are Indians of the full blood. The greater part of the remainder are mixed bloods, with a sprinkling of intermarried whites and freedmen. The full bloods represent, therefore, about one-fourth of the entire population—I mean of the citizens of the Five Civilized Tribes. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that there is a comparatively large number—I do not know how many, nor does anyone else—but a proportion somewhat large of the 24,000 of those full bloods who are not competent to manage their own business and to deal on terms of equality with the white people who are now in the Territory and who will go into it; I have no doubt, Mr. President, that there is a considerable number of mixed-blood Indians in exactly the same condition; I have no doubt that there are a number of freedmen down there who are in the same condition; but, on the other hand, I believe it to be true that a majority—a large majority—of all those people are as capable of managing their own affairs as are the average run of the American people. You can not go into any community, Mr. President, in any State of this Union where you will not find white citizens, adult males, men who vote, who exercise all the privileges and dignities of citizenship, of whom that may not be said.

I do not believe that because there may be 10 or 15 per cent of this population composed of people who are without education, who may not speak the English language, who are not qualified as Senators here are qualified, or as the average American citizen is qualified, to conduct his own affairs, that the other 85 or 90 per cent should be put under a ban and restrictions be put upon their rights to dispose of, use, and enjoy their property as other citizens may do. Those people are citizens of the United States, clothed with all the privileges and immunities of citizenship, and they have been for years.

To say that they shall not have the right to dispose of their property because, forsooth, it happens that there are some citizens among them who are incompetent, does not strike me, Mr. President, as representing a policy that we ought to enter upon in this Congress. It seems wrong in itself; it is in violation of the solemn compact that we made with those Indians. I do not believe that we ought to violate that agreement with impunity.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not quite understand, I fear, the full purport of the argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If it means anything—and I know that it does—it simply means in effect that one of the rights of citizenship acquired by the Indians is the right to have all of his property taken from him by the white population without any further protection of the Government.

The Senator, as I understand, when he said there were 95 per cent of those people as capable as those in any other community of tak'ng care of their property, referred only to the mixed bloods, and not to the full-blood Indians. If I am in error the Senator can correct me.

Mr. STONE. I said, or meant to say, that from the information I have, perhaps there were from 15 to 20 per cent of Indians of the full blood and mixed blood who, it might be said, were not competent.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are about 24,000, I think, of the full bloods left. Of those 24,000 it is probably true that not 2 per cent of them would be capable of holding their own property and protecting it against the wiles of the white men, and it is for the benefit of those full-blood Indians that I have introduced the amendment. It does not affect any of the others.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says that not more than 2 per cent of the 24,000 of those full-blood Indians are capable of managing their own affairs. I think that is a pretty strong statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is not quite strong enough.

Mr. STONE. Not quite strong enough?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not quite strong enough. So we evidently differ upon that point.

Mr. STONE. Then there is no use in disputing about a mere matter of statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. I base my statement, Mr. President, first, upon a pretty intimate acquaintance with full-blood Indians themselves. Almost ever since I can remember I have been acquainted with the Indians, with their characteristics, and have had a good deal of dealing with them, and have seen their dealings with white people. Taking my own acquaintance and observation wherever I have seen them have any business relations with white men, and taking the testimony which was given before the committee, which was to the effect that the full-blood Indians down in the Indian Territory did not differ materially in their character for indigence from the full-blood Indians anywhere else, I think I can safely say that almost 99 per cent of them would not be able to withstand the onset of the white civilization to get possession of their property. If that is true—and I think everyone who knows anything about the Indian character will agree with me that it is true—we come right back to the question whether or not it is our duty and whether we are not in conscience obligated to protect those Indians by such means as are necessary to protect them.

I know it has been often stated here that the best thing for the Indian is to place him upon his land and let him shift for himself. I will agree to that proposition, provided you have given him a good home and that you will not allow him to sell that home; but you can not place him in a position where he can sell his property that he will not sell it, and that in a very short time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, at the instance of the chairman of the committee, because of his anxiety to conclude the bill, I will state that I am not going to object to the suggestion made by the chairman that he will accept the amendment and that the matter will be settled otherwise.

Mr. McCUMBER. I fear the chairman of the committee has an ulterior motive, and that when the bill gets into the conference committee it will not receive the same support that it is receiving here.

Mr. CLAPP. I will say that the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Idaho are both together on that question, and I would be in a hopeless minority if I had any purpose of the kind.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not want to take up a moment's time if the Senator will accept the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment is accepted, then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At what point on page 27 does the Senator's amendment come in?

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment proposes to strike out all of page 27 down to and including the word "allottee," in line 20.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And insert the amendment which was read at the desk?

Mr. McCUMBER. It will be inserted in lieu of the portion which I have mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I desire to move to strike out all of lines 21, 22, and 23, on page 27.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 20, after the word "That," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out "when restrictions upon the alienation and leasing of lands have been, are hereby, or may hereafter be removed, said lands are alienable from the date of selection thereof; and;" so as to read:

Provided further, That conveyances heretofore made by members of any of the Five Civilized Tribes subsequent to the selection of allotment and subsequent to removal of restrictions shall not be deemed or held invalid solely because said conveyances were made prior to issuance and recording or delivery of patent or deed.

Mr. CLAPP. I accept that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I also move to amend the amendment of the committee, on page 28, by striking out, beginning with the word "And," in line 4, down to the word "no," in line 12.

Mr. CLAPP. And capitalize the letter "N" in the word "no." I agree to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee to section 19 as it stands amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 9, on page 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 9, page 11, after the amendment of the committee already agreed to, it is proposed to add the following:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear, consider, and adjudicate the claims against the Mississippi Choctaws of the estate of Charles F. Winton, deceased, his associates and assigns, for services rendered and expenses incurred in the matter of the claim of the Mississippi Choctaws to citizenship in the Choctaw Nation, and to render judgment thereon, on the principle of quantum meruit, in such amount or amounts as may appear equitable or justly due therefor; which judgment, if any, shall be paid from any funds now or hereafter due such Choctaws by the United States. Notice of such suit shall be served on the governor of the Choctaw Nation, and the Attorney-General shall appear and defend the said suit on behalf of said Choctaws.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment, so far as the chairman of the committee is concerned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill to turn to lines 18 and 19 on page 29, which read:

That if any allottee of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes die intestate without widow, heir or heirs, or surviving spouse, etc.

What is the distinction between "widow" and "surviving spouse?"

Mr. CLAPP. We have discussed everything to-day, but I knew there was one thing that escaped, and it is a discussion of the distinction between those terms. It is a distinction that ought to be made by the dictionary. There is no question about that.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, then, it ought to be made by the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I have some amendments I desire to offer, which are acceptable to the committee, I believe, purely with reference to the joint resolution that we have passed. The purpose of these amendments is simply to put them in conference, so that the conferees can deal with them. I move to strike out section 6.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out all of section 9, on page 11, down to and including the word "court," leaving the remainder of the section stand. I repeat that all these motions are made simply to give the conference committee full jurisdiction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out section 10 as it came from the House. If we have made any amendment to the section we will let the amendment stand.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Now, I move to strike out section 11. No amendment has been made to that section.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There are some amendments in that section. There is also an amendment in the section the Senator moved to strike out a moment ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are certain amendments made to section 11.

Mr. TELLER. Where there are amendments simply correcting the text of the House bill let them go out, but where the Senate has added something we want to leave that in, so as to retain jurisdiction over it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I call the Senator's attention to the committee amendment in section 10, at the bottom of page 11 and the top of page 12. That section has been stricken out on the Senator's motion, and I desire to call his attention to the committee amendment to see if that provision is of importance enough to cut any figure.

Mr. TELLER. If we strike out all of section 10 the whole thing will be in conference.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I only made the suggestion in view of the Senator's statement that he wanted to leave in the amendments made by the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I only want to retain those amendments that are independent of the sections of the bill as it came from the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 11, on page 13.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out all of section 15 down to the word "tribes," on page 24, line 22.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. On page 5, line 15, I move to strike out the words "by blood;" and in line 17 to strike out the same words.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, on page 5, line 15, after the word "citizens," it is proposed to strike out "by blood;" and in line 17, after the word "citizen," to strike out "by blood."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. These amendments are simply for the purpose, as I have said, of giving the conference committee control over the subject. The bill is of such a character, considering the manner in which it has been amended, that it seems to me we should give the conference committee pretty full authority to make this bill over. The conference committee on the part of the Senate will consist of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. I think we may trust them, and they will have time enough to sit down and consider the entire subject, which the Committee on Indian Affairs did not have.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FRIDAY, March 2, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2068) to increase the limit of cost of the fog signal at the light and fog-signal station at Battery Point, Puget Sound, Washington, and the same was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

CLAIMS.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar, under the rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, under the special rule of the House. The Clerk will report the first bill.

HENRY E. RHOADES.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9297) for the relief of Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, retired.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this bill ought to come from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and not from the Committee on War Claims. I make that point.

Mr. MILLER. I supposed that when the Clerk read that bill provision had been made by the Naval Committee for its consideration, and for that reason I did not raise any question in reference to it. It has not been before the Committee on Claims, and we have not had anything to do with it.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that it is not in order here; and the gentleman seems to concede it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read the rule under which we are acting.

The Clerk read as follows:

March 18, 1900, the House adopted the following order:

"Resolved, That during the remainder of this Congress the second and fourth Fridays of each month, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, shall be set apart for the consideration of private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion. The provision herein shall be made in lieu of the evening session provided by section 2 of Rule XXVI, and section 6 of Rule XXIV and section 1 of Rule XXVI are hereby modified to conform herewith."

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of this rule is to give the Committee on Claims priority over the Committee on War Claims, but not to exclude the consideration of other bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask if there is any gentleman here who can explain this bill?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what this bill is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9297) for the relief of Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, retired.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], a member of the subcommittee that reported this bill, is not present, I would ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice until he comes into the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from New Jersey will be granted, and the bill will be temporarily laid aside.

There was no objection.

JAMES STALEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12286) granting relief to the estate of James Staley, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow Bertha D. Staley, administratrix of the estate of James Staley, deceased, credit in the sum of $475.63 in the settlement of the accounts of said James Staley, deceased, late superintendent Indian training school, Yankton Agency, S. Dak., and special disbursing agent.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an explanation of this bill. I do not know who reported it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, that has not been before the Committee on Claims. We have no jurisdiction over it, and I know nothing about it.

Mr. RUCKER. This bill was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is properly on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. I will be glad to make it. I sent a few moments ago for a copy of the bill and for the report; but I am able, I think, to explain the facts and save the time of reading the report, unless the gentleman desires to have it read. The fact is that in 1890 James Staley was appointed Indian agent, disbursing officer, at the Indian training school, Yankton, S. Dak., and served in that capacity until his death. At his death his widow qualified as administratrix, and rendered an account to the Government, the Treasury Department, of the administration of the office during her husband's incumbency. That report showed a balance in Mr. Staley's hands, at the time of his death, of something like $5,000 due the Government, which was promptly placed on deposit to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. Along with that, of course, went an itemized statement of all moneys he had disbursed during the last quarter. Among those disbursements were various items, aggregating $475, the amount carried in this bill, which was stricken from the items accredited in balancing the account by reason of the fact, as alleged, that these items and expenditures were for matters not specifically appropriated for. In other words, and as an illustration, money was appropriated for improvements of some kind, and part of that money was used in repairing a barn for Government purposes there at the school, but not contemplated in the appropriation. Now, those items were cut out by reason of the fact that there was no specific appropriation for a barn. There is no pretense whatever that the man did not absolutely, in good faith, expend every dollar for which the administratrix asked credit; but the Treasury Department cut it out because, under the strict letter of the law, there was no specific appropriation covering this amount. His widow, a constituent of mine, has been called upon to pay back to the Government of the United States $475 that her husband had already expended for the benefit of the United States; and this bill simply directs that the Treasury Department allow the estate credit, on final settlement of the accounts of James Staley, deceased, for the amount of $475. It does not ask the Government to pay one single cent, but merely allow this administratrix credit for the amount which her husband has already paid out, and which the Department, properly perhaps, cut out in the adjustment of his accounts.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me. I understand this man Staley was the Indian agent at this point?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And it was his duty to have some improvements made there for the benefit of the Indians, and among those improvements he considered necessary was a barn, and he expended this amount of money for that; and when the matter came before the Auditor he refused to allow it, and charged him up with that amount, and this bill is simply to allow his widow to recover from the United States the amount of money that he actually expended for the benefit of the Indians at that Indian agency, and for which the United States has already received the work?

Mr. RUCKER. I think those are the facts, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was on the subcommittee which considered this matter, and the statement is correct.

Mr. RUCKER. As I said a while ago, this bill asks for no money from the Government, but merely asks that credit be allowed for money actually paid out.

Mr. HINSHAW. The evidence shows that he expended every cent of the amount, but expended it for an object for which the Auditor conceived he was not entitled to have placed to his credit.

Mr. RUCKER. It is upon that theory that the bill is introduced. These facts which I have stated are set forth in the report of the Auditor for the Department.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN C. LYNCH.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill H. R. 7144.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to ask what disposition, if any, has been made of Calendar No. 466, which is the bill (H. R. 12560) for the relief of John C. Lynch?

The CHAIRMAN. That bill is the next in order, and it will be read by the Clerk.

The bill (H. R. 12560) for the relief of John C. Lynch was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims shall have and possess jurisdiction and authority to inquire into and finally adjudicate the claim of John C. Lynch, a resident of Shackelford County, Tex., for property taken or destroyed by Indians, and for the purpose of this action it shall be assumed he was a citizen of the United States at the time of the injury.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to hear an explanation of this bill from some gentleman who knows about it. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] can explain it.

Mr. BOUTELL. I know nothing whatever about the bill. I was simply inquiring what the course of business was. I noticed that that bill was on the Calendar and that it seemed to be next in order.

Mr. PAYNE. If there is no one here to explain the bill, I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, it will be so laid aside.

There was no objection.

AARON EVERLY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 7144) for the relief of Aaron Everly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to substitute the name of Aaron Everly, instead of that of John O'Neal, on the muster rolls of the War Department, so as to show that he served as an enlisted man in Company L, Seventeenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, and that an honorable discharge be granted him.

With the following amendment:

Add to the bill the words: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN PURKAPILE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 13735) for the relief of John Purkafile.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to amend the record of John Purkafile so as to show him honorably discharged from Company F, Fifty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers, for disability contracted in line of duty.

With the following amendments:

Strike out, in line 4, the word "Purkafile" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Purkapile."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John Purkapile."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES W. JONES.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6982) for the relief of James W. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to James W. Jones, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $621.21, with interest from February 13, 1902. Said James W. Jones, a clerk of class 1 in the office of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, was, on February 25, 1898, erroneously arrested and summarily dismissed on February 26, 1898.

With the following committee amendment:

In lines 6, 7, and 8 strike out "$621.21" and insert "$513.71."

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the relief of James W. Jones. Mr. Jones was employed by the Post-Office Department, and in 1898 some money-order blanks were stolen from the office of the Auditor, and Mr. Jones was arrested, charged with the theft of those orders. The orders were cashed at Havre de Grace, Md., a few days after they were stolen. Mr. Jones was immediately suspended from office. Sometime afterwards the man who had stolen the orders and had them cashed confessed his guilt and immediately afterwards committed suicide. The committee gave very careful consideration to this bill. Its purpose is to pay Mr. Jones the amount of salary he would have received, and should have received, during the time that he was suspended, I think about four or possibly five months. The Department recommends favorable action in the case, and the committee also recommend that the bill be favorably reported with an amendment. I desire to call the attention of the committee to what Secretary Gage said in relation to this matter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
January 20, 1902.

Respectfully returned with indorsement as follows:

The accusations against Mr. Jones, made in 1898, were the result of an unfortunate misinterpretation of certain facts. A closer examination brought this clearly into view and served to entirely exonerate him from any suspicion of culpability in the matters then in question.

It is due to him to have this said, and my regret has been deep and will be permanent that his good name was at all brought under doubt.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Secretary Shaw also approves the payment of this bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What this claimant is seeking to recover for is the time during which he was suspended?

Mr. MILLER. That is true.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Who filled his position while he was suspended?

Mr. MILLER. Another clerk was appointed, as I understand it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And another clerk was paid for that time?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And what this man seeks to recover is for the time that he was not in service of the Government——

Mr. MILLER. That is right.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is all the claim that he has?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD (continuing). That he was charged with this offense and was suspended in due and regular form, and he now wants pay for the time during which he was suspended, and during which he rendered no service to the Government, the service having been performed by somebody else.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman from Kansas that this man was suspended on a charge that proved afterwards to be totally false, upon representations that turned out to be false?

Mr. MILLER. That is right.

Mr. PAYNE. And he was ready to perform the duties of the office, but was prevented from doing so by the fact that he was charged with this offense of which he was not guilty.

Mr. MILLER. He was suspended because he was charged with this crime. It was afterwards discovered that he was not guilty, and in order to clear his good name they immediately reinstated him and did all that they could to clear up his good name. He has been in the Department ever since, and the committee thinks now that the Government ought to pay this bill for the purpose of doing what it can to clear up the reputation of this young man and put him square with the world. The committee recommends three amendments, as follows:

Strike out all of lines 6 and 7 and the word "two," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred and thirteen dollars and seventy-one cents;" this makes it the exact amount that he was entitled to, and I ask that the amendments be adopted.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I only have a few words to say about this bill. The amount of the appropriation asked for is quite small, but whatever we may do here to-day will be presented as a precedent for something else that may come up hereafter in larger proportions. In fact, it is one of the tricks of this committee, of which I happen to be a member, to put the small claims forward first to open the way for larger ones that may follow.

Now, the officers of the Government, acting within the scope of their authority, suspended this man from his office; he was as completely removed from it as if he had never been appointed to it. Another man performed the services for the Government, and was paid for the performance of those services. Now he asks Congress to appropriate money for services that he did not perform, but were performed by another; services for the time he was not employed, because he was falsely accused of a crime through the instrumentality of some Government employee. Mr. Chairman, as I say, the amount of appropriation asked for is indeed very small, but the aggregate of such appropriations would become quite large. I think it is time for this committee and for this House to establish some standard by which these things will be done.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that in dealing with these claims we ought to be governed by the same principles that are enforced between man and man in business affairs. The United States Government had a perfect right to take the steps it did take, to suspend this man from the office he held. It was a favor to him to hold that office the time that he did hold it. He had no right to complain if he was removed, and being removed and being suspended, there is no way——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that if a private individual, under a contract of labor and service to another private individual, had been treated in the manner this young man was treated by the United States Government there would have arisen in his favor a claim for damages to be settled by the verdict of a jury for slandering him, first, and removing him, second, and thereby injuring him before the people? Now, will the gentleman point out wherein the United States Government ought not in this small way to make some compensation, not by a suit for damages for injury to character, but by simply payment of wages he would have received if he had not been assaulted in that?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the difference is very clear, as I understand it. In reply to the gentleman, he states a case altogether different from this. He says that if an employer and an employee should enter into a contract for employment for a certain stated period, and the employer should not permit the employee to perform the service that he had employed him to perform and slandered his character, he would have an action against that individual for slander.

Well, if the United States Government is liable in an action for slander, let the gentleman who seeks to enforce this claim come here and put it through on the ground that he has been slandered. But you are not asked to do that. You are asking the Government to pay this man for services that he did not perform. You are asking the United States to pay this man for services that were performed by another, and the other party was paid for them, and, as I said a moment ago, it is not the amount involved—the pitiful five or six hundred dollars—but it is the fact that you make this a precedent for the larger claims that are to follow. It is a precedent you set by which you invite all of those who have gall, all of those who have the aggressiveness to come and push themselves in here and get claims allowed against the Government that have no standing in law or equity. How many thousands such cases as this are there in this country? How many do we pay? We pay only those who go to some lawyer and get him to prepare a bill and present it to the committee. We pay one and omit to pay a thousand. We deal it out here as a sort of kingly matter of grace to a few and ignore a great number. If this sort of claim ought to be paid, then let us make a general law providing that Departments shall, under such conditions as these, pay all people who have been wronged, pay all people who have been suspended from office when they ought not to have been suspended, and not make fish of one and flesh of another. Why should this man be paid for services that he never performed and a thousand like him be overlooked entirely?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McGAVIN].

Mr. McGAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I just desire to say, in reply to what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] has said, that it is all right for him to indulge in speculation and conjecture as to what ought to be done with reference to the passage of another bill which would give a remedy in all this class of cases, but it is a condition that confronts us now. Five hundred and thirty-nine dollars can never give back this young man his good name, and the only thing this House can do at this time, the only small recompense we can make for the injury that has been done him, is to pay for the time he was out without his fault, and during which time he was ready and willing to perform the services for the Government, but was prevented from doing so by the false charge that was made against him.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 37) extending the tribal existence and government of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4229. An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up and dispose of the conference report on Senate joint resolution No. 37.

The SPEAKER. While it has been held that business of the House can be transacted when the committee has risen informally, yet the Chair prefers to put it for unanimous consent. Without objection, the House will consider the conference report on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas referred to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE IN CONFERENCE ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 37.

The managers on the part of the House make the following statement in regard to the conclusion reached by the conference on the disagreement between the House and Senate on the amendments of the House to Senate joint resolution No. 37:

After full and free conference the Senate recedes from its disagreement to the House amendments with an amendment to be added to the end of the resolution, as follows: "Unless hereafter otherwise provided by law."

This amendment simply provides that the resolution is subject to change at the pleasure of Congress.

Respectfully submitted with the recommendation that the conference report be adopted.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
JNO. H. STEPHENS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report is as follows:

The conferees on the part of the two Houses on the disagreeing votes on the House amendments to the Senate joint resolution 37 have met in full and free conference and agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House amendments, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add to the end of the resolution the following words: "Unless hereafter otherwise provided by law;" and the House agree to the same; so that the joint resolution will read as follows:

"That the tribal existence and present tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes or nations of Indians in the Indian Territory are hereby continued in full force and effect for all purposes under existing laws until all property of such tribes, or the proceeds thereof, shall be distributed among the individual members of said tribes, unless hereafter otherwise provided by law."

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
JNO. H. STEPHENS,
Conferees on the part of the House.

MOSES E. CLAPP,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
FRED T. DUBOIS,

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution, which is very short, be read as it will read after the amendment is made.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the joint resolution as it will read if the conference report is agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the tribal existence and present tribal governments of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole tribes or nations of Indians in the Indian Territory are hereby continued in full force and effect for all purposes under existing laws until all property of such tribes, or the proceeds thereof, shall be distributed among the individual members of said tribes, unless hereafter otherwise provided by law.

The conference report was considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. JONES.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the payment of claims of this sort, I think we are establishing a dangerous precedent. I have a case now in mind where a man came to me who was out of the Government service for sixteen years and was reinstated. He asked me if I would introduce a bill to pay him for the whole sixteen years of service, and if you pay this bill I propose to introduce that bill. If the establishment of the precedent is made by a payment of this character, the Congress of the United States will be heaped up with bills of this kind. When a man is out of the service and some one else in his place has drawn the pay that he would have drawn if he was in the employ of the Government, that should end the Government's liability. The Government ought not, upon the reinstatement of the man who was suspended, to be called upon to pay again.

Mr. MILLER. Now, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, as well as the gentleman from Missouri, I simply desire to say that so far as I am personally concerned I feel very much as they do in reference to the establishment of precedents looking to the payment of unjust claims, but I want to say now to the gentleman from Illinois, when he gets ready to introduce his bill, and it comes to the Committee on Claims, he will find the gentleman from Missouri, in my judgment, and the gentleman from Kansas, the chairman of the committee, opposed to an allowance of a bill of that kind.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman point out the difference in principle between this case and the other case?

Mr. MILLER. The difference in point between this case and the case the gentleman from Illinois has is this: The young man was discharged because it was believed he was a thief. He was charged by the Government of the United States with being a thief.

In the other case the man was suspended, possibly because he was not efficient or for some other good reason, from the Department, but in this case there was no reason for this suspicion. The records in the Post-Office Department at the time this young man was suspended show on that very day—the day that this warrant was cashed at Havre de Grace, Md.—he was in the Post-Office Department at work every hour in that day, and he could not have been over at Havre de Grace, Md., getting this warrant cashed. The testimony of a former Member of this House, Mr. Shattuck, was that he was at his hotel in the morning until 8.45, when he left his office to go to the Department, and from 9 o'clock until 4 o'clock in the afternoon he was there at his desk at work, and this order was cashed at Havre de Grace at 9.10 that morning. So I say at the time this man was discharged the records of the Department showed he was there at his post at work when he was charged with having had the order cashed at Havre de Grace, Md., and that it was impossible physically for him to be there. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman states in advance that if the bill which I suggested be introduced and comes before his committee he would stand in opposition to it, and then goes on to state the other case as an altogether different one and recites all the conditions surrounding the present case. The gentleman assumes that there are no such conditions in the case to which I referred. I therefore wish to ask the gentleman whether or not evidence to prove the worthy character of the claim would be listened to by the chairman of the Committee on Claims in the case to which I referred, or whether he has closed the case now and decided how he will dispose of it?

Mr. MILLER. I do not think there is any merit in it now, and if there is the committee will weigh and consider it.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman stated he would be opposed to an allowance on a bill of that kind without regard to the evidence.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I did not make any such statement, and the gentleman from Illinois knows I did not. I now ask for a vote upon the amendment offered to this bill.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

JOHN C. LYNCH.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill temporarily laid aside a moment ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12560) for the relief of John C. Lynch.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims shall have and possess jurisdiction and authority to inquire into and finally adjudicate the claim of John C. Lynch, a resident of Shackelford County, Tex., for property taken or destroyed by Indians, and for the purpose of this action it shall be assumed he was a citizen of the United States at the time of the injury.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This bill is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and if the gentleman will permit me I will explain it briefly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. These conditions of which you speak are conditions that are imposed by law?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Can not this House on the recommendation of this committee waive any law?

Mr. GRAFF. They can do it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do they not do it in a majority of these claims cases?

Mr. GRAFF. It is a question of the exercise of the wisdom of the House.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it not usually done in all these cases.

Mr. GRAFF. No; it would be a very different question if the question of citizenship was the sole question that prevented a recovery. If it is a question that goes deeper than that—the right of recovery under the law—there is not any reason why one case out of a thousand of Indian depredations should be selected for preference by this House, and I want to know what there is about this case that causes it to have special claim for favorable action on the part of the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The question of the gentleman was, as I understand it, whether these were friendly or hostile Indians?

Mr. GRAFF. I wanted to know whether there was a state of war existing at that time or not.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The record does not show anything about that. If he will let me state the case, I think he will agree that it is a worthy one and that we should pass this bill. The Court of Claims has already found in favor of John C. Lynch on every proposition except the question of citizenship. On that question he did not have direct and positive evidence as to taking out his papers of naturalization. He was an Irishman and came to this country in 1840. He went to California in about 1852, and the testimony in the record adduced before the Committee on the Judiciary shows that he was naturalized duly and properly before an officer in California in 1852; that on his returning to Texas along in 1860 he got off his horse to shoot a deer, and went off some distance from his horse and left his property, his money, and his naturalization papers on the horse. And while he was after the deer, trying to shoot it, the Indians captured the horse and carried it away.

Mr. GRAFF. What do the findings of the Court of Claims, which you say were made in this case, show with reference to a system of amity or war on the part of the Indians at that time?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I say that there was nothing in the record, so far as I knew, that came before the Judiciary Committee on that question. But the court found in his favor, stating that this was a meritorious case in every respect, except the question of citizenship was not established by direct and positive evidence, although there was an abundance of secondary evidence going to establish that fact.

Mr. GRAFF. Then he was entitled to recovery under existing law, and the court found, except as to the single point of his citizenship, he was entitled to recover?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Under existing law. Under the act of 1891 he was entitled to recover. Let me get through with this statement about this good Irishman, because he was a good Irish citizen, and has voted "early and often" since 1840 in the United States.

Now, when he was returning to Texas his horse was captured, this money was taken from him, and these papers were lost. He came to Texas and located in 1860, and since that time he has been an officer in the State of Texas, a county commissioner and a county judge of Shackelford County, Tex. For almost half a century he has been an honored and upright citizen of Shackelford County, Tex. Judge John C. Lynch is the gentleman's name. The only question before the court was that he had not adduced as a matter of evidence these papers showing that he was naturalized.

Now, here is an abundance of evidence in the record which warranted the Committee on the Judiciary in reporting that he was a citizen and that his citizenship was established by valid secondary evidence—by his own affidavit and other proof that accompanied the record.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I think this claim—for that is what it is, and I can not understand how it came from the Judiciary Committee—I think a claim of this character ought to be examined with great care.

For instance, I have in my own district a case of a teamster who had destroyed by the Indians in the far West, when he was engaged in teaming there, his entire property. Several wagons and horses were captured by the Indians, and he went before the Court of Claims, and it was there found that he had lost some $3,000 worth of property; but the court found that one of the conditions of existing law was not shown, and that was that there must be a state of amity; there must not be a state of war in order to entitle the claimant to recover on an Indian depredation. So I am compelled to say to my constituent that I was advised by the chairman of the Committee on War Claims that the committee would not entertain a claim of that character to relieve my constituent, and relieve him from a condition of existing law.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In your case was there a state of war existing?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would be glad to vote for yours, if it is a case like this, and help you get it through. I say that in this case the Court of Claims found that every requirement of the law had been met except the sole question of citizenship, and there was a failure in that only because the evidence was not direct and affirmative.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not know whether it is now too late to raise the point of order, but if it is not I would raise it that you could not send this to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CURTIS rose.

Mr. GRAFF. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am not quite through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, in order that we may get this case before the committee in all of its light, I ask that the report be read. It is short.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12560) for the relief of John C. Lynch, respectfully report the same back with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

Bills for similar relief passed Congress for Joseph Tousant, volume 30, Statutes at Large, page 1521; Fred Weddle, volume 31, Statutes at Large, page 1617.

Under the ruling of the Court of Claims, claims for Indian depredations, under the act of March 3, 1891, must show that the claimant was a citizen of the United States at the dates of the depredation complained of.

The facts presented to your committee, upon which recommendation is made, are as follows:

On August 31, 1891, John C. Lynch, a resident of Shackelford County, Tex., filed his claim for Indian depredations committed upon his property by Apache and Comanche tribes of Indians in the Court of Claims at Washington, D. C., under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," and evidence was taken in this case under the rules of the Court of Claims to establish the losses complained of, and that evidence shows the following facts as to the citizenship of the claimant, John C. Lynch, to wit:

He was born in Ireland in the year 1828 and came to America in 1840, when he was 12 years of age; came with his sister to Baltimore, Md.; he declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the city of Baltimore, Md., and afterwards went to California, and in the year 1852 was admitted to citizenship and received his citizenship papers in Los Angeles, Cal. At that time Los Angeles was a frontier country, and the judge before whom he was naturalized was a Mexican, and he remembers that he was naturalized in an old adobe house, which was used as a court-house. That he voted in two elections in California. Los Angeles at that time was a section where there was practically no law or order, and everything was done in a very loose manner. He knows that he received his citizenship papers and had them for some years afterwards.

They were lost in the following manner, to wit: He was coming horseback from California to New Mexico and had his belongings, with his citizenship papers and $800 in money, tied on behind his saddle, when he got down from his horse to shoot a deer and had crawled some distance from his horse when he was cut off from him by Apache Indians, and his horse, with his saddle and everything on him, was taken, and he never recovered them.

After some years he wrote back from New Mexico to California for a copy of his naturalization papers, but could get no satisfaction from the officers.

In 1860, in Texas, when he contemplated voting, he stated to the judge of the elections, Gladdis E. Miller, the fact of the loss of his papers and that he had written back to California and had been unable to get them, and asked if he had better take out new papers here in Texas, and the judge stated that "he was as good a citizen as he [the judge] wanted," and he voted in the election and has voted in nearly all elections since then—may say all, as he does not know of missing any. He has held the office of county treasurer of Stephens County, Tex., the office of county judge of Shackelford County, and the office of county commissioner for twenty-two years.

He was never so shocked in all his life as he was when his citizenship was questioned. He always prided himself on being an American citizen, and he is one now, if there was any doubt about it before, as he has since his citizenship was questioned taken out his second naturalization papers without reference to this claim.

The fact that no record of his naturalization can be found in Los Angeles, he thinks, is due to the manner in which court affairs were conducted at that time, as there was no such thing as law, order, or anything else in that community, and he does not suppose anything further was done than to give his papers under which he subsequently voted and which he lost, as he has stated.

He did not present to the court of California his declaration of his intention which he took out in Baltimore. He did not have a copy of this declaration. He was there with Americans, and an election was to be held and he wanted to vote, and he made affidavit of the fact of his declaration of intention before the judge, which was accepted, and his citizenship papers were issued to him.

He lived in California, Arizona, and New Mexico ten years. When he first went there he did not know anything of Arizona, as it was California and New Mexico then. Then he came to Texas and voted in 1860 for the first time, in Texas. He does not know whether there was any entry or record made in Los Angeles when his papers were issued. He was a green young man and paid no attention to that.

If there was any record made he does not know anything about it; would not swear whether there was or not, but from the way things were conducted there then he would not suppose that there was any record made. He does not remember now but one man that was present at this time, and his name was Quinn, a Missourian. He met this man in Arizona before he (Lynch) was married, and met him afterwards, but has not heard of him since.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand from the reading of the report that the only question that this bill waives, and the only question of law, is that of citizenship?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman is exactly right.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Court of Claims in its investigation of the claim had decided that under existing law the Government is liable to this claimant, but was unable to find for him on the evidence of citizenship.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And upon the facts submitted to the committee that had charge of the bill it concluded that the evidence practically established the fact of citizenship within the meaning of the law, and in returning it to the Court of Claims this authorizes the court to assume citizenship in favor of the claimant?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is true.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I believe, with the gentleman's consent, I will take the liberty of stating that, in my opinion, this is a meritorious claim. I believe the Government ought to pay all just claims against it. It ought not to be imposed upon, but it ought to be a model paymaster of all righteous and just claims under laws of its own making; and after the explanation of the gentleman from Texas it seems to me that there can be no question of the fairness and entire justice of this claim.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I first desire to thank the gentleman for his statement and afterwards to apologize to the committee for taking up so much time when there are so many other meritorious claims that ought to be considered by this committee. I want to get through as soon as I can. This bill leaves every question open to be determined by the Court of Claims except the one of citizenship, and all that it does is to say that the citizenship of John C. Lynch shall be assumed when the matters again go before the Court of Claims, and then if he has not a meritorious claim as a citizen his claim will be defeated. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CUSTER COUNTY, MONT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 4736) for the relief of the county of Custer, State of Montana.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4736) for the relief of the county of Custer, State of Montana.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the board of county commissioners of Custer County, Mont., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,350, in full settlement of all demands against the United States for the construction of a steel bridge across the Tongue River for the accommodation of the Fort Keogh Military Reservation in Montana, according to the terms of the contract entered into between the said board of county commissioners and D. D. Wheeler, quartermaster, United States Army, dated in September, 1897: Provided, That said county of Custer shall maintain and keep said bridge in repair without charge or expense to the United States.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield until I make a statement?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes; but I want the report read before it is concluded.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Let me give the gentleman one of the reports.

Mr. MILLER. This bill provides for payment to the county of Custer, Mont., of $4,350, as the amount agreed upon by Government officers for the construction of a bridge connecting the military reservation of Fort Keogh, Mont., with Miles City, Mont. I call the attention of the committee to the agreement, which is found in this report, and which was entered into between the county commissioners of the county of Custer and Maj. D. D. Wheeler, quartermaster, United States Army, at the time when the subject was under discussion looking to the building of this bridge. The bridge was largely in the interest of the military reservation. At that time $4,350 was allotted or set apart by the War Department for the purpose of paying one-half the cost of the bridge. The county commissioners afterwards entered into a contract for the construction of the bridge, and it was constructed, and at the time that it was completed and accepted by the Custer County commissioners, and after the War Department had had a man there continuously watching the building of the bridge, and it was approved by him, when the report was made to the War Department, some officer of the Department held that the quartermaster-general at St. Paul had no right to enter into a contract of this kind, and canceled the allotment that prior to that time had been made for the purpose of paying the Government part of the expense in building the bridge, and since that time the matter has been before Congress on several occasions.

This bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims in the Fifty-eighth Congress, but was not reached for action in the House. It is unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims at this time, and I ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PALMER. What right had the quartermaster to make this contract?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I will say that I do not know whether the quartermaster had a right to make it or not, but he did make it, representing the Government of the United States, and then the War Department indorsed his action by setting aside $4,350 for the purpose of building that bridge; and then the county commissioners, in consideration of the fact that this allotment had already been made on the part of the Government, entered into a contract for the construction of the bridge, and it was constructed and afterwards accepted by the board of county commissioners and the officers at Fort Keogh. Then the county of Custer asked for its pay from the Government and the Government declined to pay, for the reason that the quartermaster had no authority.

Mr. PALMER. How could the Secretary of War, or the War Department, or anybody else set aside any money to pay any such claim as this, or honor such a contract as this, without any authority from Congress or any authority of law?

Mr. MILLER. I will yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. PALMER. I do not care anything about the general proposition. I want an answer to that question.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will be called upon to read the report.

Mr. MILLER. I want to appeal to the gentleman from Missouri, who is a member of the Committee on Claims, and who has been all over this matter, and I hope he will not insist on reading the report. If we read this report, it simply means that none of these bills can be passed this afternoon. I trust that opportunity will be given to any Member to ask any question which he desires, and I shall be glad to have the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] answered.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that in 1897 the Secretary of War set aside $4,350 to pay one-half of the cost of a bridge connecting the Fort Keogh, Mont., Military Reservation with Miles City, on the other side of the Tongue River.

Mr. MANN. Out of what fund did he set this aside?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Out of the appropriation for transportation of the Army.

Mr. MANN. I understand that money appropriated for the transportation of the Army was ordered to be set aside for the Secretary of War to build a permanent improvement.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. That was what was done.

Mr. MANN. And then the Comptroller or the Auditor afterwards decided properly that the Secretary of War had no such authority.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. To build it out of that fund.

Mr. PALMER. Nor out of any other fund, without authority of law.

Mr. MANN. And without any money being appropriated for that purpose at that time.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. This is a claim that will bear inspection by any gentleman on this floor. This was in the Department of Dakota. The quartermaster, General Wheeler, of the Department of Dakota, went to Fort Keogh, went before the board of county commissioners of Custer County, went over the proposition for the building of the bridge and entered into an express contract on behalf of the United States Government with the commissioners, that if they would build the bridge the Government would reimburse Custer County for one-half of the expense. Afterwards the money was segregated here in Washington by order of the Secretary of War. When it came to draw the warrant, the then Secretary of War held that the quartermaster of the Department of Dakota did not have the right to enter into that contract except by express authority of the Quartermaster here at Washington. The county not only expended double the $4,350, but they expended about $10,000. The bill should really carry $5,200, instead of $4,300. Then the matter was referred to the Quartermaster-General's Office here in Washington, and his report is found on the first page of the report of the committee. The Quartermaster-General of the Army here at Washington, in transmitting the matter to Congress on February 2, 1899, stated that it was purely and simply on account of a technical error; that the money was properly due Custer County under the contract with the Government, and he recommends that the bill be paid.

The Quartermaster-General in that report when this bill was referred to him recommended that this amendment be favorably reported, as the county was entitled to the payment of the amount stated therein. There is no question about it, it is purely a question of whether the quartermaster-general at St. Paul had the right to make the contract instead of the Quartermaster-General in Washington.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I see by the report that it is stated that in November, 1897, a new contract was executed with the county, and the Comptroller of the Treasury to whom it was referred decided that the contract was one which the War Department had no legal right to make.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. In answer to that I will explain. The first contract was for the construction of a wooden bridge. After the contract had been entered into with the quartermaster-general at St. Paul they wanted to build a steel bridge, and the question was raised whether, after having contracted to build a wooden bridge, the county could build a steel bridge that cost $2,000 more than the Government had agreed to pay for the wooden one. This bill only carries one-half of the estimated cost of the wooden bridge.

Mr. MANN. But how does the gentleman get around the decision of the War Department that the quartermaster-general had no authority to enter into a contract?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. They held that the quartermaster-general at St. Paul couldn't legally enter into it, but it should have been made by the Quartermaster-General at Washington.

Mr. MANN. The statement made in the report is that the Comptroller decided that the War Department had no right to make the contract. That was the decision.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I have stated what the question was.

Mr. MANN. Was it not put on the ground that there was no appropriation for it?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. No; if I have been informed correctly. Now, the Government had an officer to inspect the bridge when it was built, they have used it ever since, the county of Custer has lost $1,700 for the half that the Government is not asked to pay for for the steel bridge.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. McCALL. Has the Government derived any benefit from the bridge?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes; absolutely. It connects the Government reservation with the town. The city of Miles is situated on one side and Fort Keogh is on the other, and it connects the military reservation with the town.

Mr. McCALL. Was it necessary for the Government to have a bridge there?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Yes; the Quartermaster-General says it was a military necessity. If the county had not built the bridge, the Government would have had to build the whole of it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Fort Keogh is one of the largest military reservations, is it not?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. It is the largest in the Northwest.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And there are large bodies of troops stationed there?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. A full regiment of cavalry is stationed there.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think, Mr. Chairman, the misapprehension arose from this. Under the law the Quartermaster's Department has the right to make a contract for all kinds of transportation within the limits of the Government reservation. It would have the right, undoubtedly, to make a contract for anything up to the middle of that river, but beyond the middle of the river, I presume, it would not have a right to enter into any contract, and that may be the basis of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I think that was one of the considerations. Tongue River is the dividing line, and this bridge was across that river.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I have not had my question answered yet, but I will ask another. Is not the substance of the whole business that they have an equitable claim against the United States, but if this bill is passed it recognizes the principle that any contract made by any officer of the United States without authority will authorize somebody to come to Congress and ask for relief?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I will not admit that. The Government has one-half of this steel bridge on its reservation, and every day the soldiers use this bridge in going to and from Miles City and the Northern Pacific Railway depot. It was built with the agreement that the Government should pay one-half of it, and a more just claim was never presented to Congress.

Mr. PALMER. But the gentleman must acknowledge that the people who made the contract on the part of the Government had no right to make it; they had no right to appropriate money from the transportation fund to pay for it, and all the gentleman claims at best is that it is an equitable claim against the Government.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. The Secretary had set that fund aside——

Mr. PALMER. On whose authority?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I do not know.

Mr. MILLER. I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Illinois who asked in reference to the decision of the Comptroller upon this contract that this decision was rendered after the bridge was half constructed.

The requirement was that the bridge was to be completed by 1897, and this decision was rendered on March 10, 1898, at the time the Secretary disapproved the same and revoked the allotment of $4,350. That was after the completion of the bridge. I would like to have a vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago in the House there was considerable discussion because the War Department took money appropriated for transportation and devoted it to plumbing and other methods of building and construction which may be useful to troops while they are resting from their travel. The House was of the opinion then that the War Department ought not to be permitted to take out of money appropriated for transportation that which it might please for the construction of a permanent structure. Now, the gentleman goes a great deal further than that in this case. The War Department, having money appropriated for transportation, legally under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, attempted to divert it from transportation purposes to the construction of a bridge.

I do not feel myself in this case warranted in opposing this proposition to pay this money, because I can see the equities of the case, but I hope it will not be taken as a precedent for the future illegal action of the officials of the War Department entering into contracts which are not only illegal but immoral, because they propose a diversion of money appropriated for one purpose to another purpose, contrary to the intent of Congress, and going beyond the intention of the appropriation bill.

Mr. PALMER. What is that hope based upon? Would it not be better to turn this claim down and not trust to any illusive hopes that some other Congress would not take this for a precedent?

Mr. MANN. I am not sure but the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be right, and yet personally I feel unwilling to put the entire burden of this evasion of the law, both upon the part of Congress and the War Department, upon this county, which probably does not have great wealth. It entered into the agreement supposing that the War Department officials would only do that which they were entitled to do under the law, and we ought to see to it that the War Department in the future does not do these things with our provisions in the appropriation bills, whatever may be done with this proposition.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota and Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I only want to make this remark before that report is read.

Mr. MILLER. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman intend to insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I presume I shall. I do not yet know.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman is going to insist on the reading of the report, I suggest that we have it read now, because after a full discussion of it I do not see the propriety or the necessity of reading the report.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a preliminary remark. Now, this claim has no basis in law or equity. There is no method on earth by which this claimant can recover that amount of money unless this Congress will pass a retroactive statute relating back and covering that thing. An ex post facto law is the only possible foundation there can be for this and kindred bills that come in here.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. There is the contract.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is an ex post facto law for the benefit of an importunate claimant who comes here when there are thousands and thousands of claimants who recognize that they have no status and do not come. If they all came we would not have time to pass them through this House if we were disposed to do it, and here the membership of this House, without a particle of consideration, without having read the report, without having it read in the House, is now willing to cast its vote in favor of an ex post facto law giving to this claimant a remedy that it has not now, a right that it has not now, and you propose, in addition to that, by an ex post facto law, to make legal a contract that was absolutely illegal and void from the day it was written. Mr. Chairman, this is a part and parcel of a number of bills that are here by which we are to set aside the law. In favor of the people? No; but in favor of some particular importunate claimant who has a Congressman who is ready to father his case upon this floor.

Why should not those who have not the service of Members of Congress be heard here? If this is a proper sort of law, if this is a proper sort of claim, then let us adopt some general law that will appy to all of them alike and not to this particular claimant, who comes advocated by some particular Member of Congress, when all others are ignored and excluded from our consideration. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I object to the reading of the report. I simply want to say, in conclusion of this argument, that the unfortunate claimant that is coming here for relief at this time is the people of Custer County, Mont., and they have a right to come here.

The Government of the United States agreed with them that if the people of that county would pay half the cost of building a bridge across that river that the Government of the United States would pay the other half.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Where is the agreement?

Mr. MILLER. They completed their part of the contract. They built the bridge, and they ask the Government of the United States to deal fairly with the people of Montana, and especially of Custer County. [Applause.] I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] has asked that the report be read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No, sir; I did not. I asked it, as a matter of right, at the beginning, and I was cut off with the statement that it should be read later.

The CHAIRMAN. A report is only read as a matter of debate. The gentleman from Kansas objects to the reading of the report.

Mr. MILLER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Will the committee order the reading of the report?

The question was taken; and the reading of the report was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

LINCOLN NATIONAL BANK, LINCOLN, ILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5954) to authorize, etc., the Secretary of the Treasury to issue gold certificate in lieu of one lost to Lincoln National Bank, of Lincoln, Ill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the Lincoln National Bank, Lincoln, Ill., a duplicate in lieu of United States gold certificate of the act of March 14, 1900, series of 1900, numbered 17705, for $10,000, issued by the assistant treasurer of the United States, Chicago, Ill., on August 29, 1904, payable to the order of the said Lincoln National Bank, Lincoln, Ill., and alleged to have been lost or destroyed: Provided, That the said Lincoln National Bank shall first file in the Treasury a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificate, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost or destroyed certificate hereinbefore described.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield for just a suggestion?

Mr. MILLER. I would like now to state this case.

Mr. PRINCE. It has nothing to do with the case, but it is simply in order that Members may know what bill it is.

Mr. MILLER. Well, I have no objection if the gentleman's statement is brief.

Mr. PRINCE. I hope the reading clerk, when he reads the bill, in also giving the number of bill will give the number of the report, so that we can more readily find out what the bill is in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, for the information of the committee, that this bill is H. R. 5954, and the bills will be taken up in their Calendar order hereafter.

Mr. PRINCE. That does not give the Calendar number. I hope the Clerk will announce the Calendar number at the same time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have only a short statement to make of this case. This bill simply gives authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a certificate in lieu of the lost one, providing a bond is filed for double the amount that is claimed, to save the Government of the United States harmless against any claim that might be afterwards presented. The amount involved in this was $10,000. There is no objection on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to having this done, and I know of no reason why it should not be done. The Department recommends it, and the facts in the case are so clear and conclusive I do not want to state anything further in relation to it, and I therefore ask that it be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Do I understand that this bill is to reissue a check which is lost?

Mr. MILLER. How is that?

Mr. MANN. This bill is to permit the reissue of a check that is lost.

Mr. MILLER. No; it is a duplicate United States gold certificate.

Mr. MANN. Well, is not there a general law on the subject?

Mr. MILLER. No; this is a certificate, not a check. The general law does provide for the reissue of certificates, but that is only up to $2,500.

Mr. GARRETT. And in this case it is $10,000.

Mr. MANN. Did we not pass a law recently on this subject removing the limit?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. It is not a law, however; it has not passed the Senate, and it is exceedingly important that this bill should pass.

Mr. MANN. If that bill does pass the Senate, will it be broad enough to cover a case like this?

Mr. MILLER. I think it will, but I am not sure about it. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

MONONGAHELA IRON AND STEEL COMPANY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6) for the relief of the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company, of Pittsburg, Pa.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas it appears that L. G. Boggs, pay director, United States Navy, did on the 13th day of June, 1904, issue a check, No. 8369, upon the assistant treasurer of the United States, New York, N. Y., in favor of the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company, for the sum of $5,445.56, being in payment for "chain iron" furnished the United States Navy Department, which check was mailed by the said L. G. Boggs to said company, and was lost in transmission through the United States mails, and was never received by said company; and

Whereas section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the provisions of the act of February 16, 1885, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, applies only to checks drawn for $2,500 or less: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said L. G. Boggs, pay director, United States Navy, be, and is hereby, instructed to issue a duplicate of said original check, under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill simply authorizes the pay director of the United States Navy to issue a duplicate of an original check on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York in favor of this company. The bill provides for the protection of the Government in case the said lost check should be found, and accompanying is the favorable indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, who recommends that the bill be enacted into law. The check has been lost, and the evidence before the committee is abundant upon that subject, and the committee recommends favorable action.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I see the form of the bill is a certificate of good character from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. During the short experience I have had in this House I think Congress has never provided that a preamble should be a law, and this whole statute depends on the preamble. Your enacting clause comes after the description of what you are going to do.

Mr. MILLER. I think the bill is all right, and I am willing to take the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is daily dealing with problems of this kind.

Mr. MANN. It may be that the Secretary of the Treasury would issue the check or pay the money, but he is not the one to judge whether we cumber up the statute with a lot of long-drawn-out lingo in a preamble that has nothing to do with the enactment we wish.

Mr. MILLER. What is the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I would suggest that in the future, at least, the Committee on Claims do not bring in a lot of long preambles, which cumber up the statutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to be heard on that. I move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. MANN. It has always been customary to strike out the preamble in such bills, but you can not strike out this preamble and leave anything to the bill. The trouble is that the enacting part of this bill is in the preamble and comes before the enacting clause.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. In my opinion——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will give the gentleman from Kansas time to conclude the motion he was making.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be informed at this juncture whether I may be heard in my own right on these bills?

The CHAIRMAN. If the floor is clear, the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to be heard in his own right.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that striking out this preamble would in any manner destroy the remedial portion of this bill. I therefore move that the entire "whereas" be stricken out. It adds nothing to the bill. It mars the pages of our statutes. It introduces into our legislation a new form of a bill that I do not think we ought to introduce, and I therefore move that the bill be amended by striking out the preamble.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] that the bill be amended by striking out the preamble.

The question was put, and the affirmative was taken.

Mr. MILLER. I do not think that will defeat the purposes of the bill at all. The suggestion was made by the gentleman from Illnois [Mr. MANN], and I do not think it will defeat the purpose of the bill by striking out the preamble.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that the provision of the bill after the enacting clause does not describe. If you strike out the preamble, there will be nothing left of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Was not the vote taken on the motion a while ago?

The CHAIRMAN. The affirmative was taken a while ago. The question now is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GRAFF. If the gentleman will yield to me for a suggestion, I will state that heretofore, when I had the honor to be chairman of that committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that we are now under the five-minute rule on this bill.

Mr. GRAFF. And that it has been customary heretofore to have in the preamble simply explanatory matter to show why the bill should pass. It has been customary to strike out the preamble; but I understand, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the check is not properly identified in the bill. Therefore I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that he offer an amendment to perfect the bill itself, and then strike out the preamble.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon a vote for favorable action on the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN W. DONOVAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12028) granting relief to John W. Donovan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay John W. Donovan, of Livingston County, Mo., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $32.23, for services performed as enumerator in the Eleventh Census of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in reference to this bill, I desire to state that it is for the relief of Mr. Donovan, paying him $32.23 for services performed as an enumerator. He claimed $3 a day for twenty-four days.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman permit the suggestion that he permit the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] to appear in advocacy of this bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. I am grateful to the gentleman from Texas for his suggestion. I want to say, nothwithstanding the fact that the report in this case has been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], I am inclined to think it is all right. [Laughter.] This gentleman is entitled to the amount claimed here. He presented his bill for a larger amount, and when it was disallowed and this amount was tendered he declined to accept it, and after the appropriation was exhausted or balance left turned back to the Treasury he then asked for the payment of the amount stated in the bill, but then there was no fund out of which it could be paid.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the concession made that the bill I am reporting is just when it is only $32?

Mr. MILLER. It is not because of the smallness of the amount, but because it is made by the gentleman from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. I will.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this enormous sum provided for in this bill, $32.23, is full pay for the twenty-four days' work this man did for the Government?

Mr. MILLER. He was only entitled to the per capita rate—the schedule rate. That amounted to the exact amount in this bill. He was not entitled to $3 a day nor for twenty-four days' work.

Mr. MANN. This person worked for the Government twenty-four days—nothing being stated whether he was under the eight-hour law or not—for $32.23. Has he received any money at all?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If we have a general deficiency bill, he can get it in the next bill.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask whether he received any pay for this work?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know whether he did or not. This is the amount now claimed by him and what he is entitled to. Whether he has been paid any amount for other work I do not know. This is all there is now due him.

Mr. MANN. This is the entire pay?

Mr. MILLER. This is the entire amount that is due him and that the Government says is due him.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to inform me whether he has already been paid or not any portion or anything for the twenty-four days of service that he has done?

I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who introduced the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I understood when I introduced this bill for this very conservative amount that some gentleman from Illinois or some other State would criticise it on account of the insignificance of the amount. This is for an old gentleman who lives in my district, who performed duties as an enumerator of the Eleventh Census. He thought he was entitled to $3 a day for his services, but under the law he was only entitled to pay by schedule rate; and instead of the amount of $75, which he claimed and thought he ought to have, the Census Office said that he was only entitled to $32.23. He became a little obstreperous, and refused to accept that amount. So it went along for about ten years. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the beneficiary in this bill has not received anything for his services and that if he had known he was only to get $32 he would never have performed the service; but that is all he is entitled to under the law.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

QUONG HONG YICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5223) to reimburse Quong Hong Yick for one case of opium erroneously condemned and sold by the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5223) to reimburse Quong Hong Yick for one case of opium erroneously condemned and sold by the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $270.41, to Quong Hong Yick, for one case of opium erroneously condemned in the United States court and sold by the marshal under a writ of venditioni exponas.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this is a claim of Quong Hong Yick. It seems that by a change of marks during transmission, for which this claimant was in nowise responsible, this case of opium, which should have gone through to Mexico, appeared to be consigned for consumption to New York. The facts were that at the same time a large shipment was made to another firm known as Wing Wo Chong, and it seems that the two packages belonging to Quong Hong Yick, upon which the marks were not definite or very certain, were changed, according to the evidence in this case, by some employee or agent of the railroad company or the ship company, and as a result these two boxes, which should have been marked "1 and 14 Q. H. Y.," were in fact marked "24 and 28 W. W. C.," and after the discovery was made they were held as "illegal importation; fraudulent intent," and the case containing opium was sold. On December 4, 1900, the two cases marked "W. W. C." and numbered 24 and 28, erroneously shipped to Progreso, were returned and entered at New York by Wing Wo Chong. This property was sold for $270.40. It has been the rule in these cases to refund the net proceeds of the sale. The evidence shows conclusively that these people were not in fault when these two cases were shipped through to Progreso, Mexico, on account of this change made by some one without their knowledge or consent, and they simply ask this relief. We think they are entitled to it, and the Treasury says they are entitled to it. I move that the bill be laid aside, with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EDWARD KING.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5221) for the relief of Edward King, of Niagara Falls, in the State of New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Edward King, of Niagara Falls, in the State of New York, the sum of $90, said sum being the amount paid to the United States Government for duties on certain horses imported by him at Buffalo, N. Y., and which said horses were afterwards discovered to have been stolen by one William Potts in Canada, and which were, after their importation, returned by the said Edward King to their rightful owner.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, Mr. King, the claimant in this case, is a liveryman at Niagara Falls, N. Y. He bought three horses from a man by the name of Potts, from Canada, and imported them at the port of Buffalo. He paid a duty on them of $90, or $30 on each horse. It afterwards turned out that Potts had stolen these horses, and Potts, whose right name was William Stewart, was arrested, tried, and sentenced to twenty months' confinement in prison, and the liveryman returned these horses to their rightful owner in Canada. He asks that the amount paid by him as duty be refunded. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. What does the Treasury Department recommend?

Mr. MILLER. The Department recommends favorable action.

The motion of Mr. MILLER was agreed to.

Accordingly the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES M. DEMAREST, DECEASED.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6101) for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Demarest, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to refund and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, to the legal representatives of the estate of Charles M. Demarest, late of Warwick, in the State of New York, the sum of $122.26, being the amount due on one first-mortgage preferred bond issued by the Champaign, Havana and Western Railway Company, No. 251, and dated July 1, 1879, and paid into the United States Treasury on February 23, 1898, by the clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois, in accordance with section 996, as amended by the act of February 19, 1897 (29 Stat. L., p. 578), which provides that money remaining in the registry of court unclaimed for ten years shall be deposited to the credit of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the Champaign, Havana and Western Railway, sold under foreclosure September 7, 1886, to Anthony J. Thomas, trustee, was subsequently sold to the Chicago, Havana and Western Railway Company, and a deposit made in the registry of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois to cover bonds not already canceled that were secured by deeds of trust dated, respectively, July 1, 1879, and December 1, 1880, and the clerk of said court, on February 23, 1898, under the statute which provides that money remaining in the registry of the court unclaimed for ten years shall be deposited to the credit of the United States, paid into the United States Treasury the balance of moneys in said court arising from the sale of said railway property. Subsequently Charles M. Demarest died possessed of one first mortgage preferred coupon bond issued by the Champaign, Havana and Western Railway Company, No. 251, and dated July 1, 1879, of the par value of $100. Its real value was $122.26.

The committee thought, in view of the moral obligation resting upon the Government, it having received the money upon which this bond was a lien, the lien having been transferred from the property to the proceeds, that favorable action should be taken on the bill. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury concurs in the action of the committee and recommends that it be paid.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the amount recommended to be paid is simply for the value of the bond which was actually deposited at that time?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It includes no interest?

Mr. MILLER. No interest.

Mr. MANN. And there is no question about the ownership of the bond?

Mr. MILLER. None whatever.

Mr. MANN. Has the bond been produced?

Mr. BRADLEY. Yes; I produced the bond before the committee.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; the bond has been produced.

ZENAS PARKER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 649) for the relief of Zenas Parker.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to Zenas Parker, late postmaster at Stewart, Houston County, Tenn., the sum of $161.73, being the amount of funds belonging to the Post-Office Department of the United States stolen from the said Zenas Parker by burglars December 24, 1902.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill simply provides for the payment to Zenas Parker, who was a postmaster at the time stated in the bill at Stewart, Tenn., and gives him credit for $161.73 on account of a loss by burglary which was committed on December 24, 1902. I will read a part of the statement from the report:

OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 25, 1904.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have carefully reviewed the evidence relative to the claim of Zenas Parker, postmaster at Stewart, Tenn., for a credit of $161.73 on account of loss by burglary December 24, 1902.

It appears that Mr. Parker is 74 years of age and a man of excellent character; that he is a gunsmith and shoemaker and does his work at the post-office, where he has a bench and where he sleeps nights; that on the date of the robbery he locked the front door and closed the rear door of the office, which fastens with an old-fashioned wooden latch with string attached; that he is unable to say whether he withdrew the latch string before he closed the door or not; that he went out the rear door to take a mail pouch to the depot to an incoming train and was gone but a short time, his wife taking his place shortly after he left, and that during his absence and before his wife took his place postal funds amounting to $161.73, which he had put in a small wooden cabinet attached to the wall of the office, were stolen.

I can not consistently reverse the action of the office in this case, since, technically, Mr. Parker should not have left the office alone a moment unless he had left the postal funds in a securely locked receptacle, which he did not do. However, since there is no question as to the entire good faith and honesty of Mr. Parker, and since these funds were at all other times given extra protection, owing to his sleeping in the office, I suggest that this is probably a case for Congressional relief.

Very respectfully,

C. H. ROBB,
Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department.

Hon. L. P. PADGETT, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

The evidence filed with the committee shows that his wife went to the post-office within a very few minutes after he left. He left to take the mail pouch to the incoming train and was only gone a few minutes, and between the time he left the office and the time that his wife entered the money was taken. On account of the high character of the postmaster, according to the testimony of many of his neighbors and friends, the committee felt that in view of the fact that at all other times, in order to protect the property of the United States, he slept in the post-office, this allowance ought to be made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the Postal Regulations provide for the reimbursement where money is stolen out of the post-office within certain limits. The Post-office Department will not reimburse for a claim of this sort, which it has the power to do, where there has been any negligence at all on the part of the postmaster. Post-office burglaries, I am sorry to say, are getting common throughout the country. This particular case is meritorious from the standpoint of one case, but there are more than a hundred cases every year in the United States which are not reimbursed and are equally meritorious cases.

I formerly had a few post-offices in the district which I have the honor to represent. Among those post-offices I remember one case where a burglary was committed in the post-office, and the postmaster not being able to show that he had locked the safe did not get reimbursement from the Post-Office Department. When he talked with me about a special bill, I said I could not favor a special bill under those circumstances, because if we did it in one case we would have to do it in all cases.

In view of the fact that we have so many burglaries in post-offices we ought to put a premium upon carefulness and not upon negligence. Here is a proposition to put a premium upon negligence—a man who leaves his money drawer with nobody in charge of it, with the door unlocked; it was his own fault, and he comes and asks the Government to reimburse him. As a matter of charity it may be all right to reimburse him, but what are we going to do with all the other cases? The Post-Office Department has a right to pay this man under the law, if it thinks that he ought to be paid, but it will not pay him, because paying him in this case will require the payment of hundreds, and in the course of a few years thousands, of other cases where the burglary occurs through the negligence of the postmaster.

I doubt very much the propriety of setting a precedent, even though I feel that this man ought not to be compelled to suffer the loss.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I was impressed by one remark made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER]. He said, in effect, that this was an unusual sort of a bill, but the committee had been so favorably impressed with the particular good character of this claimant that it would, so to speak, make exception from the general rule on account of his exceedingly good character. In other words, we are here not only to legislate in favor of this claimant by enacting an ex post facto law and give him that for which at present there is no law to give him, but we are limiting the class of claimants to those who shall be successful in showing that they have an especially good character. That is the basis upon which he rests this claim for this appropriation. The committee, he says, was impressed with the splendid character of this man. Now, Mr. Chairman, had we not been impressed with the splendid character what would have been the result? If we follow the lead of this committee, Congress becomes an investigator of the character to determine whether or not the man shall stand within or without the pale of the law. Has this man a just claim? If so, his claim ought to be paid regardless of what his character is. Is it without legal merit? Then it should not be paid without reference to what his character is. This is the case of another importunate claimant who has an active Congressman to push his claim for him.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reply to the gentleman that the Congress of the United States now has spent more money listening to the objections to this bill than it requires to pay it. The man is very old and very poor, and it is a small matter. It is simply for this committee to say what it wants done. It is a matter of absolute indifference to the chairman of the Committee on Claims. We have reported this bill favorably because we believe it ought to be paid, and if it was to establish a precedent from which we would be afraid to break away in the future, I would not be in favor of the bill. I believe that every bill ought to stand on its own merits. Here is a man who for many years has been postmaster in a little country town, where he has no place in his building to lock up his money, and he puts it in the only place he thinks is safe when he goes out in the evening to take the mail to the train, asking his faithful wife to come in and look after the office when he is gone. She comes in a few minutes later, but before she comes this money is taken. In view of the long and faithful service of the old man, in view of his high character and that he is a poor man, we simply ask that this claim be allowed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] seems to have the impression that if anybody desires information upon a bill which he has reported that that Member is intrenching upon his prerogatives. If it be the fact that the House has already in the consideration of this bill expended more than the amount involved in the bill, the gentleman from Kansas should consider that that action of itself is somewhat of a criticism on his committee, because his committee ought not to present to the House bills which would cost the Government so much for consideration. A few moments ago we had up for consideration the bill for the payment of $32, a claim which is fifteen years old. It is barred by the statute of limitations of every State in the Union, a claim that could be enforced in no court in the world under any circumstances, a claim for $32.

If the gentleman considers the time of the House is so valuable he ought not to bring before the House claims of $32, barred by every statute of limitation, and then criticise Members of the House who desire information concerning the claims. Now, I appreciate that there may be justice in the claim which is pending before the committee at present, so far as the equities are concerned. The Post-Office Department, I understand, is very unjust in many of its rulings concerning the keeping of money. It is true that this man under the provisions of law and the Post-Office Department had to keep this money in his pockets or in the money drawer. There was no place that he could deposit it. If he had put it in a bank it would be cause for removal, for violation of the law. If he had deposited it with a friend, it would be cause for removal. He was compelled either to carry this money around with him in his pocket or else deposit it where it was safe; and yet, Mr. Chairman, I hope the House when it passes this bill—and, of course, I understand very well that the gentlemen who remain in the committee are largely interested in bills on the Calendar of this character—will not consider that it is under obligation to every postmaster in the land who, through his own neglect, permits the postal funds to be stolen and thinks he can then come before Congress and be reimbursed.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

JACOB PICKENS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8717) for the relief of Jacob Pickens.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Jacob Pickens, of Neosho, Mo., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $208.44, being the amount stolen from a registered letter belonging to the said Pickens and collected by the United States Government from a mail contractor, said sum being now in the United States Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EDWARD F. STAHLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10605) for the relief of Edward F. Stahl.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Edward F. Stahl, the sum of $362.50, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse him for losses sustained in carrying out a surveying contract for the survey of the boundary between Wyoming and South Dakota in 1904, due to the existence of conditions not known to him or the Government at the time of making the contract, and the delay caused thereby.

With the following amendments:

In line 4 strike out the word "Stahl" and insert the word "Stahle."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Edward F. Stahle."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some explanation of this bill before there is a vote on it. This seems to be a bill to pay a man for not carrying out his contract.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to say that Edward F. Stahle, on July 1, 1904, entered into a contract with the United States to establish with permanent iron and granite monuments 104 miles of the boundary line between Wyoming and South Dakota. On reaching the sixty-sixth mile corner from the beginning of his survey, Mr. Stahle found that that corner and 25 miles from that point north of the boundary had been established and monumented, in practically the same manner in which he was to do the work under his contract, by the United States Geological Survey, who had executed this work in surveying the boundaries of the Black Hills Forest Reserve.

Upon finding this condition of affairs this surveyor, in place of going on and completing the work under his contract that he could have done, and received his pay for the full amount required under the contract, notified the Department at Washington what he had found and said he would await their further instructions, and the Department, on receipt of this notice, notified him he need not make the survey, and he is not asking for pay for this work that he did not do, but simply asking for pay for the amount of time he was occupied in waiting to receive instructions from the Department. Had he gone on and completed the survey it would have cost the Government of the United States $2,000 more than now required, and in view of the fact this is very reasonable and is recommended by the Department, the committee makes a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, the Department had money with which to make a survey, I suppose?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MANN. And made a contract for the survey?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, it was to the interest of the Government to save a couple of thousand dollars by not making a portion of the survey. Was not the Department able to do that and settle the contract?

Mr. MONDELL. May I reply to the gentleman?

Mr. MILLER. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, under the contract Mr. Stahle had with the Government it required him to make this survey along this definite line, and when he came to a particular point he found another Department of the Government, the Geological Survey, had already made a survey of a part of the line, 25 miles in length, and without going on and going over the same line again and marking it, as he was required under the contract, with these iron monuments, he stopped where he was and reported the fact that he had found part of this line had been surveyed and——

Mr. MANN. I understand that; but I want to find out whether if the Department had $2,000 to spend for a survey and had made a contract for the expenditure of that money and finds that it is more profitable to the Government not to expend the money but to pay out $300 instead of spending the $2,000, why can not the Department do it?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. MILLER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois I want to read a paragraph from the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to Mr. Stahle in regard to this matter. He says:

The contract with Mr. Stahle provides "as a full compensation for the whole expense of the resurvey" specified rates per mile "for every mile and part of mile actually run and marked in the field," and in view of these specific terms this office was without authority to consider the above items of expense and could only approve the account for the amount found due for the mileage actually established, as shown by the field notes, and the deputy was so advised.

Had Mr. Stahle again gone over the part of the line reestablished by the Geological Survey there would apparently have been a useless expenditure of nearly $2,000.

In other words, Mr. Stahle had a contract to survey this line and under the contract he would have continued his survey over a portion of line which had been already resurveyed by the Geological Survey, but when he reached a point where they had reestablished the line he ceased work and wired the Department and awaited their answer, and he is simply asking for the amount which he had expended in payment of his field force while awaiting further orders rather than the amount which would have been due him under the contract had he continued, and as the contract provided for the payment by the mile actually run, the Department could not pay him, and recommended that this bill pass.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, ordinarily a man who makes a contract can modify it. If the Department could make a contract to pay a survey by the mile, certainly they had authority or ought to have had the authority to relinquish a part of the survey which is unnecessary and pay for what has been done unless there was a specific appropriation for the survey by the mile. Can the gentleman inform us on that point?

Mr. MONDELL. This survey was paid out of the general appropriation for surveys.

Mr. MANN. It would seem ridiculous to say that the Department, having entered into a contract to expend $2,000, would be without authority to get the same good with $300.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, however that may be, the Department held they had no such authority.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill as amended aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

FRED DICKSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9528) to reimburse Fred Dickson for the loss of his tools through the fire which destroyed the engine house at Fort Duchesne, Utah, on December 19, 1902.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Fred Dickson, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $155.65.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have an explanation. The title is longer than the bill, and covers a lot of things which are not in the bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the report contains all of the items, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the report. In brief, this is a statement of this case. This claimant, Fred Dickson, was employed as a packer at Fort Duchesne, Utah, and had been there for a number of years. For several years he had been doing the work of carpenter and tinner and some work as a plumber. There was no plumber there at the time, and there were but few tools, if any, that could be used in this class of work. This man was a poor man, and he was required to keep the tools necessary to do this class of work, and he bought the tools that are described in this bill. I have an itemized statement of them, amounting to $155.65.

I do not wish to read the entire itemized statement, but I will simply say that the post sawmill and pumping station at the post burned down. The shop that was assigned to this man was located in the building of the said sawmill, and the shop, which contained all his private tools, was completely destroyed by fire. He did everything in his power, according to the evidence in this case, not only to save his own tools, but to save the property of the Government as well. The Department recommends favorable action, and in view of the fact that he is a poor man and that he was required to keep these tools there in the performance of his duty, the committee thought it ought to be paid, and the amount being small, we recommend favorable action.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

CAPT. GEORGE E. PICKETT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14467) for the relief of Capt. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Capt. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,456.17.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I call for a reading of the report in that case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] has the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would ask the gentleman to have the report in that case read.

Mr. MILLER. Let me ask the gentleman if he will not be satisfied with an explanation?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think the committee will be very much more satisfied with the report. That fully explains the situation.

Mr. MILLER. I will make an explanation of it, and if the gentleman insists on his request I will have no objection to the reading of the report.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Very well.

Mr. MILLER. This bill provides for the reimbursement of Capt. George E. Pickett, paymaster in the United States Army, in the sum of $1,456.17. Now, when or where this amount was taken or lost it was impossible to determine. This officer immediately cabled his friends in the States to send him the necessary funds and made the shortage good. Had he not made the shortage good and paid the money immediately he would have been relieved by operation of the subsequent act of Congress which was passed on March 3, 1903. So that the fact that he paid the money out is the only reason that he is here now. Had he not paid it he would not have been required to come to the Congress of the United States asking for this relief.

I desire to read a part of this report in order that members of the committee may have full knowledge concerning it.

Per Special Orders, No. 57, Department of Northern Luzon, June, 1900, I proceeded to and paid troops at posts—see attached itinerary—disbursing $165,395.62 and taking in about $28,000 soldiers' deposits. The money was carried in one iron safe and nine small wooden boxes, which had only screw-down lids and were nailed together, two screws in each box being deep countersunk for sealing, every precaution being taken in sealing. These boxes, being the best that could be obtained at that time, were furnished to all the paymasters.

The money was at all times under a strong military guard, and every precaution and measure of safety was taken by me. I never allowed either money or guard out of my sight except at such times as it was physically impossible for me to keep personal espionage of it, and at those times I was forced to rely upon the military guards furnished.

I was in the saddle every day for twenty-eight days on this trip, covering on horseback, bull carts, and wagons 588 miles, through swamps, jungles, and rice paddies, knee-deep to waist-deep in mud and water, and over dangerous mountain trails in pouring-down rain, crossing innumerable small rivers, fording and swimming them, getting wet to the skin every day, and generally arriving at my destination covered with mud.

Upon arriving at Lingayan I was compelled to make the entire trip to Bolinao and return, a distance of 160 miles; also trip from Lingayan to Bautista, a distance of 48 miles, via intermediate points (see itinerary), by pack train of fifteen or twenty mules under charge of one chief pack master and four packers. This was a very dangerous country at that time on account of insurrection. As the nature of tropical jungle and trails only permitted single file, my pack train was necessarily strung out some distance. It was repeatedly halted by the miring of horses or mules, and in numbers of instances it was with great difficulty and untiring zeal on my part that loss of both mule and pack was prevented. During the time that I gave my personal attention to saving a mule and his load it was impossible for me to see or even be advised of what might occur at other points of the pack train, extended out, as it was, some distance along the trail.

The large number of troops to be paid, the nature and amount of tropical country to be covered, render it necessary often to make payments at night and travel in the day. The requirements of troops in the field compelled me to carry unlimited amounts of small change, the remainder of the money being mostly gold coin. Also troops on one roll often being scattered in many different places, miles apart, it was necessary to keep rolls open till all men on them were paid. Unlimited change, rolls being kept open, orders requiring rapid completion of payments, hardships and nature of journey, made it impossible to strike a balance until after my return to Manila. The money was carefully counted and balance obtained as soon as possible, and the robbery was not discovered until then.

I reported these facts at once to the chief paymaster of my department and the chief paymaster of the division, and asked that experts be placed on my accounts immediately and a thorough investigation be made, at the same time turning over the safe containing the funds on hand to the chief paymaster of northern Luzon. I cabled to Washington to my mother, asking that I be cabled $800. Shortly thereafter she replied by cabling me $900 to Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, Manila. I received only $854 from the bank.

The amount advanced to me by my mother's cable was returned to her by my transferring pay accounts to her each month thereafter till paid back.

Then this officer goes on further and says that he paid this money to make his account good. This is recommended by the officers of the Department, and the committee is fully convinced that it ought to be paid. Let me say, there have been a number of other losses occurring in the Philippine Islands and a number of persons arrested, tried, and convicted for stealing the money, and afterwards Congress passed an act that these losses should be refunded to them where the money had not already been paid over; but in this case this paymaster had, in order to save his good name and to have his accounts credited and straightened, paid the money promptly. And this is to give him relief.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that as a member of the Committee on Claims I opposed the payment of this claim. The gentleman from Kansas refers to the fact that a number of persons were arrested in the Philippine Islands and prosecuted for the larceny of certain funds. There were no persons arrested in the Philippines and prosecuted for the larceny of these particular funds.

Mr. MILLER. No; that is true.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They were arrested, prosecuted, and convicted in some instances, for the larceny of other funds. I want to say that there are bills before the committee to reimburse those persons—those officers—and, I think, in those cases the committee reported unanimously in favor of the bills. But in this case, Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no explanation whatever, and no attempt at explanation, as to what became of that money. Here is an officer intrusted with funds of the Government who goes out upon a tour paying soldiers and others in the employ of the Army. When he returns to Manila and casts up his account, it is found that he is short some fourteen hundred and fifty-odd dollars. He does not know how it occurred. He was not robbed. There is no evidence that a larceny was committed; no evidence that it was taken in any way at all. Just simply short that much. Of course, he refunded it to the Government, as he had to do, and having refunded it, because it was intrusted to his care, he was responsible for it. He ought to have refunded it; he was in duty bound to refund it; he had no more than performed a duty that rested upon him. Now he seeks relief at the hands of Congress, to reimburse him this money, which it is apparent, on the face of the record, was lost by his own negligence.

I say, Mr. Chairman, it would be an exceedingly bad precedent for this bill to pass; and the only reason, as I recollect it, given in the committee, the only reason given here, for the passage of this bill is the fact that some other persons similarly situated have been paid by the Government. I assert, Mr. Chairman, that we are not bound to follow a precedent unless the precedent is a good one. If we are confronted by a bad precedent, if these other officials have been paid and paid improperly, and it is now discovered that the payment was improper, the time for Congress to call a halt is when the discovery is made, no matter who may suffer. For that reason, then, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, and sincerely trust that the committee will not recommend its passage.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is exactly on all fours with this condition of affairs. If a postmaster of this country, intrusted with Government funds, should ascertain that he was short, making no explanation at all, he would have as much right to come to Congress and ask that he be relieved as has this military officer, your agent. And it is exactly on all fours with this proposition. The treasurer of a corporation, intrusted with the funds of a corporation, a trusted employee intrusted with the cash of the firm, wakes up some morning and finds that he is five, ten, or fifteen thousand dollars short. He makes a report to his employers, "I had this money; you intrusted me with it; I was responsible for it, every dollar of it; now I find myself this much short. I do not know how it occurred. I do not know who got it. There is no evidence that the vault has been tampered with; there is no evidence that the strong box has been broken; no evidence of a burglary or larceny; it has simply disappeared; and I ask you to relieve me." That is the case here, Mr. Chairman, and I hope this bill will not pass.

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, in a very few words I will answer the statement made by the gentleman from Florida. He says there is no explanation of the loss of this money. Now, the chairman of this committee has read the sworn statement here from Major Pickett, going into the details, and showing under what conditions and what circumstances he lost this money. To say that there has been no proof along that line is to deny the emphatic sworn statement of this Virginia gentleman who comes here and makes a frank statement of the condition of his accounts, stating that the money was lost and that he at once, or as soon as he could wire to his home, replaced the amount.

Mr. MANN. May I ask if this officer was from Virginia?

Mr. LAMB. He is from my district.

Mr. MANN. That settles it.

Mr. LAMB. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I am for the bill, because I know the gentleman from Virginia would not favor any claim, even from Virginia, unless it was right.

Mr. LAMB. After that statement, Mr. Chairman, it is scarcely worth while for me to make any further reply to the gentleman from Florida; but let me just answer his last point. He supposes an imaginary case of some postmaster losing money with which he was intrusted. Suppose, my friend, that any postmaster in this country had lost money by reason of a fire, or by reason of a robbery, which was the case here, no doubt. Would not the United States Government reimburse him in that situation?

Again, suppose my friend from Florida was intrusted with a large business, and he sent an agent to pay the employees of that business, and, owing to the fact that that agent had to go through a rough and difficult country, like that described here by Major Pickett in this sworn statement, robbers had stolen the money from his box, and that paymaster or agent should come back and make a plain and direct statement of how he lost this money. Would not the gentleman from Florida, as the head of that business, cheerfully reimburse this agent for the loss, sustained without any negligence on his part? That is just this condition. The gentleman would no doubt order an investigation, but that has been done here, and I think if the chairman of this committee had asked that the letter from the Paymaster-General on the eighth page of this report be read and had then asked that Secretary Shaw's recommendation be read the question would have been answered. I ask, with the consent of the chairman of the committee, that the letter from the Paymaster-General and the recommendation of Secretary Shaw be read. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make one remark. I have no doubt that this gentleman came from Virginia, because the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] says so. I take it for granted that he is a good, honest man, but he comes here and makes a statement absolutely without corroboration. Suppose in another case some other man had embezzled the money. Suppose he had lost it in a friendly game of draw poker with somebody. Suppose he had applied these funds to his own purposes anywhere, under any circumstances. He comes in and makes, as the gentleman from Virginia says, a clear statement of it. He says, "I was beset by thieves on the road." Mr. Chairman, thieves sometimes sit around a friendly table, as well as elsewhere. I am not talking about this officer; I am talking about some other man in this officer's place. Suppose this other man has embezzled money that has been put into his custody, and he undertakes to free himself from responsibility by his own uncorroborated statement.

Take the case of the teller of a bank. Out in my State they indict them and send them to the penitentiary if they do not come up with the funds intrusted to them. They say, "Mr. Bank Cashier, where is this money that was put in your hands?" "I do not know, sir. I had it last night. I counted my money to-day and part of it is gone. Somebody has stolen it." According to the statement of the gentleman from Virginia that would be sufficient defense, and the cashier ought to be relieved from any responsibility upon his own uncorroborated statement that he was robbed.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman from Missouri states that this officer comes here and makes a statement without any corroboration. I want to ask him if in that statement the officer undertakes to explain what became of this money? Does he make any explanation at all?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. He does not. He says he started out with a given sum of money and he paid his expenses and he came in and when he came to strike a balance he found he was a thousand dollars short. "I do not know what became of it. I was in a country where there are thieves. I take it for granted that it was stolen from me, and I ask the Government to repay it."

Mr. Chairman, are we going to set a precedent here to-day that every man who is charged with funds may come before this seemingly omnipotent committee, of which I happen to be a member, and ask that upon his uncorroborated statement he shall be relieved of his responsibility? If Captain Pickett can be relieved to the extent of a thousand dollars, Captain Tugmutton can be relieved to the extent of a million dollars. Where is the end to it? But I suppose it will be like the gentleman from Kansas said about another case here—that this is a good man, and therefore he has found favor in the eyes of this committee.

Mr. LAMB. He does not say that.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We have just passed a bill to relieve a postmaster from responsibility for money which he says was stolen. How do we know it was stolen? He says somebody stole $169 out of a box that was nailed up on the wall. Perhaps it is true in that case, but we must act here under general rules. We must have some general regulation. If we take that postmaster's word, we must take the word of the next one.

Mr. LAMB. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Certainly.

Mr. LAMB. Does not the gentleman suppose that the Paymaster-General investigated all these matters; does he not suppose that all the facts governing this case, which the claimant could not put into a simple letter, were investigated by the Paymaster-General? The Paymaster-General of the United States Army recommends the payment of this matter.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will answer the gentleman in a minute. The gentleman will recollect that a short time ago a letter came in here from the head of a Department recommending that the Committee on Appropriations put in the urgent deficiency bill a sum to reimburse a man for having painted a picture of a chief who had gone out of office. The heads of the Department are not responsible to the people; they have not been elected as "watchdogs of the Treasury." But the gentleman from Virginia and I have been sent here to keep close watch on the acts of Congress. This man in the Paymaster's Department says it probably ought to be repaid, but what does he know about it? What does he know about it more than a citizen who lives in my district? This man does not account for how he lost his money; he does not even undertake to say that it was not by corruption. Suppose now your captain had been a dishonest man instead of a good Virginian that you say he is; suppose he had determined to embezzle a thousand dollars, how better could he do it than to take a thousand out of the big pine box, with the lid screwed down with three screws, that had been carried across the world, as he tells you—how better could he have embezzled a thousand dollars than that?

Mr. LAMB. I would like, Mr. Chairman, for my colleague to understand the character of the recommendation of the Paymaster-General. He say under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1903, as has been fully explained by the chairman of the committee, if he had not paid the money he would have been the beneficiary of that act. Therefore he throws himself out from the fact that he was honest enough to wire to his mother to send him the money to make his accounts good.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes; he comes in with the money, but what would he have done if he had had no mother?

Mr. LAMB. Probably he would have been an orphan. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Here is this man, with thousands of dollars of the public money, and he turns up on pay day with his money gone, and what explanation does he make? He says he wired to his mother to please send him the money to make good the amount he owes the Government. Now, Congress is going to relieve him. Why? Because back behind this good Virginian he happens to have an active, energetic Member of Congress to push his special favor through the Claims Committee, and push it with his popularity through the House, when some other man who may not stand so well will have to pocket his loss. It is a species of favoritism; it is a species, Mr. Chairman, of that more gentle use of the term of "graft," whereby one man gets that which is denied to the balance of the country. That class of legislation must eventually get the condemnation of all honest-thinking people who consider it. Here is this man backed up by a good, active Member of Congress, the gentleman from Virginia, who never fails to put his case through, while some other less importunate man, some other man who has not the service of so able a Representative, does not get the special favors that we deal out here as a matter of favor and not as a matter of right and justice.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the members of this committee will realize now something of what the Committee on Claims has to contend with in order that they may come in here with a favorable report. [Laughter.] I want to say in addition to what has been said that so far as the negligence of this officer is concerned I put over against the statement of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] the statement of the gallant officer who has been conscientious and always faithful in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it is because the distinguished gentleman from Florida and the distinguished gentleman from Missouri are on the Committee on Claims this year, but it is a fact that the claims which have been called up to-day on the Calendar are, on the whole, less objectionable than any set of claims I have seen on the Calendar since I have been in the House. [Applause.]

I appreciate what the Committee on Claims, not only of the present House but of the last House, endeavored to do in reference to these claims, to confine the reports on claims to meritorious ones, yet the Members of the House have a right to know about this. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is a fact that under the act which is quoted in the report, approved March 3, 1903, this officer would have been relieved by the War Department of this loss of money if he had not in fact paid the money over.

Mr. MILLER. There is no question about it at all. He would have been entitled to pay and would have received it from the Department.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, just a word or two. I do not know what the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] meant when he said that the House could see what the Committee on Claims had to contend with, but I desire to say to that distinguished gentleman that as long as I am a member of the Committee on Claims and so long as I am a Member of this House, owing allegiance to no one except the people of this country, and knowing no guide save my conscience under my oath of office, I shall object to and oppose any measure that does not commend itself to my better judgment, no matter what may be the very much better judgment of the distinguished and able chairman of the Committee on Claims.

It has been said by him, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] agreed to it also, that the paymaster had recommended the payment of this claim and the Department had recommended it. We are acting upon our oaths here. We are the persons to settle this question, and when these officials make a recommendation to this House for the payment of a claim, they owe it to us to give the reasons upon which they base the recommendation. There is not a shadow of reason given in these letters; there is not a shadow of reason given in this report. It is simply presumed that somebody stole this money. It is a violent presumption with no evidence to support it, not a single solitary fact to show what went with it. The officer simply says it disappeared. He simply says he was short, and the boxes in which it was stored showed no evidence of having been tampered with by anybody. So if you want to argue the question from the surrounding facts, then you have got it incontrovertibly established that no outside person had access to those boxes, that nobody could have gotten that money except some of the persons having it in custody. I do not insinuate, Mr. Chairman, I do not charge this officer with wrongdoing, I do not intimate that he is guilty of it, but the fact remains that it was in his custody; he had guards around it; he and they are the only persons who had access to it, and it disappeared.

No charge, no intimation, that anybody robbed him; no charge, no intimation, that anybody had an opportunity to rob him. He had it and it is gone. What became of it he does not know, and he does not undertake to say, and yet because gentlemen question the propriety of paying a claim like this the chairman of the committee intimates that he has two very obstreperous members on his committee. I want to inform him now that so far as one of them is concerned he will continue to be obstreperous until when a bill like this is asked to be passed some fact or some reason that commends itself to sound judgment is submitted in its favor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

SYDNEY LAYLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2996) to reimburse Capt. Sydney Layland for sums paid by him while master of the U. S. transport Mobile in July and August, 1898.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Capt. Sydney Layland the sum of $119.11, to reimburse him for amounts paid by him as master of the Army transport Mobile to soldiers of the Sixteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers for services as firemen on the U. S. transport Mobile in July and August, 1898.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, in order to perfect the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the bill is open to amendment I would like to have an explanation of what the bill is.

Mr. MILLER. There has been an amendment sent to the desk, and I want the amendment read first.

Mr. MANN. For information only.

Mr. MILLER. Then I will explain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in the fourth line, after the word "Layland," the following: "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to provide for the payment to Capt. Sidney Layland of the sum of $119.11, paid by him as master of the Army transport Mobile to soldiers of the Sixteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers for services as firemen on the U. S. transport Mobile in July and August, 1898. From the record of the office it appears that the Army transport Mobile sailed from Charleston on July 21, 1898, with troops on board, for Ponce, P. R., and on the return voyage brought troops from Santiago, Cuba, to Montauk Point, New York; that on arrival at Charleston the engineer crew were short six firemen, and under the authority of the officer commanding the troops the master of the transport was authorized to employ soldiers to perform the work of firemen and stokers, and for this service the master, Captain Layland, paid the men the sum of $119.11. Q. M. Gen. C. F. Humphrey says that it ought to be paid, and that view is concurred in by Secretary Taft.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN H. THARP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13247) for the relief of John H. Tharp, of Eversonville, Mo.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to John H. Tharp, of Eversonville, Mo., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $35, being the amount stolen from a registered letter belonging to the said John H. Tharp and collected by the United States Government from a mail contractor, said sum being now in the United States Treasury.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the relief of this man Tharp, who mailed a registered letter in the post-office of Eversonville, Mo., addressed to the Dayton Book and Paper Company, of Quincy, Ill. The registered letter was stolen, and the carrier who stole it was arrested, tried, and convicted, and sentenced to prison, and the Department kept the money out of the pay of the contractor, and it was paid into the Treasury of the United States, and this is simply to pay the man for the money he had in the registered letter.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question? Is this the second one of these? Does the Post-Office Department, when a registered letter is stolen, take the amount that is stolen out of the contract price of somebody?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know that it is always done, but in this case they kept back—there were several of these registered letters—from the contractor the full amount of money in all the letters, and that money was paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH CROW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7709) for the relief of Joseph Crow.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $1,029.59 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and that the same be paid to Joseph Crow, of Omaha, county of Douglas, State of Nebraska, to reimburse him for a like amount charged against his account as postmaster by reason of embezzlement of post-office funds by Alfred M. Oleson.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in this case Joseph Crow was postmaster at Omaha, Nebr., and his stamp clerk, as I remember it now, Alfred M. Oleson, embezzled $2,029.59 from the funds of that office. Oleson was arrested and convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of $2,000. He paid his fine, and after the fine was paid the people of the city, his friends, gave a banquet in his honor, and he is now holding a position in one of the leading hotels in the city of Omaha while the Government is trying to collect now from the postmaster the full amount of money embezzled by the clerk. There was paid in this fine $2,000, and on the bond of the stamp clerk $1,000, making $3,000 which is already in the Treasury of the United States as against the $2,029.59 embezzled, and now the Government is asking the postmaster to pay the other $1,029.59, and we simply say we think the postmaster ought to be relieved from paying the balance of this money.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, is it the policy of the Government to pay defalcations of post-office clerks?

Mr. MILLER. Not as a general proposition.

Mr. MANN. Was not this man under bond to the postmaster?

Mr. MILLER. He was under bond, and they have brought suit on the bond and recovered $1,000, all they could have recovered.

Mr. MANN. Was it not the duty of the postmaster to have a good bond?

Mr. MILLER. The postmaster thought there was a good bond, the Government accepted the bond, and the postmaster was in no way responsible for it. One thousand dollars was collected on the bond, and all that can be collected upon it, and the $3,000 now having been paid into the Treasury of the United States we do not feel the postmaster here ought to be compelled to pay this other $1,029.59.

Mr. MANN. It being the duty of the postmaster to secure a proper bond in order to protect himself, ought the Government to pay a loss caused by the negligence of the postmaster?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, in November, 1903, Oleson, a stamp clerk in the Omaha post-office, embezzled $2,029.59. He was arrested and pleaded guilty. He was fined $2,000. The fine was paid, and the Government has the money. The only statement made by the gentleman from Kansas, the chairman of the committee, to which I wish to take exception is the statement that Mr. Oleson, the embezzler, is now occupying an honored position in the city of Omaha. I challenge that statement.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, possibly he is not, but I got my statement from the report made by the Post-Office Department to the Committee on Claims, from which I read:

He refused to make the shortage good, was arrested December 1, 1903, indicted, and when the case was called for trial pleaded guilty and was fined $2,000, which he paid. His father-in-law is United States commissioner, and it is reported that his friends gave him a banquet after the trial of the case. He is now employed in a good position in the Iler Grand Hotel, the leading hotel in the city.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, that is secondary evidence and is not true; but that is outside the question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But for all that appears here he might be a porter in the hotel.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. That is true. But be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, after the Government had fined this man and collected the fine the Government received the proceeds of his bond in the sum of $1,000. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the bond did not run to the postmaster. The postmaster did not select this employee; he could not discharge him. The bond ran to the Government in such amount as the Government approved, and to-day the Government is $970.41 ahead on this transaction, and it is still seeking to hold the postmaster on his bond for $1,029.59. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the language of Postmaster-General Payne, who has a letter here which is a part of this report, to say that the postmaster shall now make good this amount for which the Government is seeking to hold him is to put him in a worse attitude, in a worse position, that the thief, and I do not believe this Government or this committee is disposed to do that. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, but that this bill should be favorably reported and passed by the House.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the facts in this case are that at this place—Omaha—the post-office has various stamp clerks. Stamp clerks are allowed a credit of so much in the way of stamps. The Government endeavors to protect both itself and the postmaster by requiring a bond from the stamp clerks which more than equals the amount of credit in stamps which is given to them. It is the duty of the postmaster to see that the credit extended to the stamp clerks is not above the amount which is expected to be extended. The report in this case shows that this stamp clerk was extended a credit of $700 in stamps. If the post-office had been properly administered, the stamp clerk could not have in his possession at one time more than $700 worth of stamps. When the stamps ran short he received stamps from the chief stamp clerk. But the duty of the chief stamp clerk was not to give him a credit in stamps greater than $700, as appears by the report in this case. And yet this man embezzled $2,000 in stamps. The administration of the office was so faulty, so poor, so without discipline, that instead of holding this stamp clerk down to a credit of $700, he embezzled $2,000 worth of stamps. Now, it is a queer and a new doctrine to me that because the man is hauled up in the criminal court and fined $2,000 on the penal side of the court that therefore the Government should turn over a part of the penalty to the man who is in fault, namely, the postmaster. Since when did we commence to take the fines which the Government collects as a penalty in order to reward the man who is guilty of negligence?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. What did it cost the Government to prosecute that man sucessfully to conviction and collect that fine?

Mr. MANN. Probably more than $2,000.

Mr. KENNEDY. In this instance?

Mr. MANN. When you consider the force that is maintained by the Government in order to capture and prosecute the criminals in the Post-Office Department and elsewhere, probably more than $2,000; but what it costs, after all, makes no difference.

Now, the post-office inspector who is acquainted with the circumstances in this case, who knows what was done in this matter, is not in favor of the passage of this bill. The post-office inspector, who is charged in a way with maintaining honesty and discipline in the Post-Office Department, reports that Congressional aid, in his opinion, should not be extended. It seems to me that when the post-office inspector opposes turning over a part of the fine collected from the criminal to reimburse the man guilty of negligence, the Congress ought not to encourage embezzlement in the Post-Office Department or lax discipline in the post-offices of the country by favoring a bill like this.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to state to the committee that there was a rule in the Omaha post-office to the effect that the credit of this clerk for stamps was limited to $700. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. The inspector, Mr. Harrison, in his report stated that such a rule obtained in Kansas City, and that if a similar rule had been adopted in Omaha this loss might not have occurred.

But there was no rule, there was no requirement, Mr. Chairman, which prohibited this stamp clerk from getting this large credit; and, Mr. Chairman, while the inspector, Mr. Harrison, disapproved of the allowance of the amount to the postmaster, that report was afterwards disapproved by the Postmaster-General, and he stated in a letter, which is a part of this report, that he believed this allowance should be made to the postmaster, and that he doubted even if greater vigilance had been exercised if the robbery could have been prevented.

Mr. Chairman, the postmaster was honest. The man who was postmaster at that time was as vigilant as any postmaster could be under all the circumstances. The gentleman from Illinois has asked us to-day to charge this postmaster with absolute responsibility for the honesty and integrity of men he did not select, men he could not remove, and men whose bonds ran to the Government and not to him. [Applause.] [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the passage of this bill will say that the postmasters of this country shall have no liability for embezzlement by clerks in post-offices when they can not discharge post-office clerks and can not appoint post-office clerks? There is not a post-office in the United States of any size where the postmaster can either appoint or discharge the clerks. Is it the intention of my friend from Nebraska to say that Congress, by the passage of this bill, announces as a doctrine that postmasters are not responsible for the embezzlement of clerks they have that are in the classified service? That is the argument of my friend. Lead it out fully all along, and where will the country end upon that proposition?

Mr. HINSHAW. What possible sense is there in a civil-service system that says the superior officer shall have no control over either the appointment or dismissal of a clerk, and yet he shall be liable for his defalcation?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the civil-service law is not in question in this bill. Does the gentleman from Nebraska say that he will relieve the postmasters for the embezzlement of clerks in the classified service? Would the gentleman vote for a law upon that question in that way?

Mr. HINSHAW. I would vote for a law which would give them a chance to appoint and remove.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know the gentleman says he would vote for a law upon that. That is not the question before the House. It is easy to say that a man will vote for something which he can not vote for. You do vote for this bill; you are compelled here to put yourselves on record upon this bill; not upon an imaginary bill. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, I think.

Mr. HINSHAW. I beg your pardon; I would not be upon that committee.

Mr. MANN. The committee would be graced if the gentleman were on it, I will say.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to say that we will relieve these people from embezzlement on that ground—why, it seems to me a ridiculous proposition.

Mr. CHANEY. I beg to ask the gentleman a question. Why should you hold responsible to the Government the postmaster for the defalcation of a stamp clerk who had given his bond directly to the Government to secure the faithful discharge of his official duties?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of holding the postmaster responsible in these cases is to see that the postmaster exercises proper discipline. It is no explanation of the matter that in many cases where postal clerks have defaulted the postmasters have been held responsible. The law provides it. And, Mr. Chairman, so far as I know, there is no dearth of applicants for postmasters, notwithstanding their liability for the acts of their clerks.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Illinois, do you know of a single case where the postmaster has been held liable for the amount of a defalcation or embezzlement when the Government has been reimbursed for every dollar stolen and is $970.41 ahead on the transaction?

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman talks about reimbursement. I say we collect fines that have been imposed by the courts after reimbursement. I know of more than one case where a fine has been collected and at the same time the defalcation has been made good by the postmaster. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

COL. MEDAD C. MARTIN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 14344) for the relief of Col. Medad C. Martin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow a credit in the accounts of Lieut. Col. Medad C. Martin, deputy quartermaster-general, United States Army, for the sum of $708.65 (pertaining to the appropriations for regular supplies, $92.85; incidental expenses, $30.50; Army transportation, $585.30, fiscal year 1905), which sum was stolen, through no fault of the officer, January 8, 1905, while in transit from Manila, P. I., to Lipa, Batangas, P. I.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this is another bill for the reimbursement of a paymaster of the Army for money stolen on a pay trip. I call attention to the fact that this money was in a safe, and the paymaster was not with the safe, and in the nighttime the funds were stolen. The men who stole it have been arrested, tried, and convicted, and the Department says that this officer should be reimbursed. The committee agree with the Department, and I wait now for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] to concur, and then I will move to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be agreed to by acclamation. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Missouri favor this bill?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There must be something suspicious about it. [Laughter.] I think we are entitled to a full explanation. [Laughter.]

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF MASSALON WHITTEN, DECEASED.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 12252) for the relief of the legal representatives of Massalon Whitten, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal representatives of Massalon Whitten, deceased, the sum of $137.50, with interest thereon from the 31st day of March, 1861, for services performed by said Massalon Whitten in his lifetime as mail contractor on route No. 10256, in the State of Tennessee, between the 1st day of January, 1861, and the 31st day of March, 1861.

With the following committee amendments:

Amend the title by striking out the words "legal representatives" therein and inserting in lieu thereof the words "heirs at law."

In line 5 of the bill strike out the words "legal representatives" and insert in lieu thereof the words "heirs at law."

Strike out the words "with interest thereon from the 31st day of March, 1861," in lines 7 and 8.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Whitten was mail contractor on route 10256 in the State of Tennessee from January 1, 1860, to June 30, 1862. The Auditor of the Treasury Department states that there is no evidence that any service was performed after March 31, 1861. Mr. Whitten was paid in full to include December 31, 1860, and there remains to his credit for the services performed from January 1 to March 31, 1861, the sum of $137.50.

Many claims of this class were paid in whole or in part by the Confederate States government, but the mutilated Confederate records now in the possession of the Treasury Department do not show, so far as they go, that any payment was made to Mr. Whitten for service under this contract with the United States.

I desire to say in reference to this case that it is one of a class of claims that come up as the result of the civil war. The contracts for carrying the mails were suspended, but this State did not go into secession until long after this period. This man carried the mail and performed the service, and this amount of money is standing to his credit in the Treasury of the United States. The Confederate States government passed a law for the reimbursement of those people, but there is no evidence to show that the Confederate States government ever paid this claim. On the contrary, the evidence before the committee shows that the claim has never been paid, although the mutilated records in the Department do not show that fact. So far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee, I want to state that my position is simply this: I would be in favor of a general bill providing for the payment of this class of claims within a certain period provided the evidence was presented to the satisfaction of the Treasury Department that they had not been paid by the Confederate States government. I will not, as a member of the committee, at any time in the future favor or report any claims of this class except where the evidence does show conclusively that they were not paid by the Confederate States government.

I think there is merit in this claim and that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the report does not pretend to say that there is any merit in the bill. Now, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] has stated there was some merit in the bill. I do not understand why the committee does not put it in the report. There is not a line in the report to indicate any merit in the bill; there is not a line which says that the bill is meritorious. The report refers to a letter from the Auditor, which so far from indicating merit indicates that the bill ought not to be paid.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois I will say that he is right on this proposition. I regret that the committee did not put all in the report that should have gone into it. We had evidence before the committee to show that this claim had never been paid by the Confederate States government, and that should have been stated in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were considered, and agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN T. IRION.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13154) for the relief of John T. Irion.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $180, to enable the Postmaster-General to reimburse John T. Irion, late postmaster at Paris, Tenn, the amount paid by him under authority of the Post-Office Department for rent of post-office accommodations in the town of Paris, Tenn., during the year 1888.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I will read for the information of the committee a letter from the Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General, in which he says:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1905.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 20th instant, submitting claim of John T. Irion, of Paris, Tenn., for rent of room occupied by post-office at that place about 1888 to 1889, I beg to advise you that the records of this office show that there was an allowance made for post-office premises during that period, but the original records have been destroyed by direction of act of Congress and the details are not available. The records of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department might show whether Mr. Iron received any credit for rent during that period.

Very respectfully,
J. J. HOWLEY,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say, for the benefit of the committee, that this bill has not only the approval of the Post-Office Department, but also the approval of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. If that be the case, it requires a little further explanation. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I find this situation in the report: Here is an act of Congress requiring certain records to be destroyed after a certain length of time. After the records are destroyed and the Government has no evidence on its part, then comes up for the first time a claim for money, which would either be proven or disproven if the records were in existence. Is it to be the policy of the Government, having required that certain papers be destroyed, then to pay the claim because these papers do not show the claim to be fully paid?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the distinguished patriot from Missouri.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I understand that some records are required to be destroyed, but the ledgers showing the contents of them are retained, and these ledgers show that this man has not been paid for the amount that he asks here.

Mr. MANN. Who knows how much he is entitled to? Let me read from the report of the Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General:

I beg to advise you that the records of this office show that there was an allowance made for post-office premises during that period, but the original records have been destroyed by direction of the act of Congress, and the details are not available.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, read the Auditor's statement.

Mr. MANN. The Auditor reports that the records have been destroyed, but the ledgers show that no credit was made on rent, light, and fuel. How does the gentleman establish the amount of claim, if there be one at all?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Tennessee will be able to throw some light upon it other than that in the report.

Mr. SIMS. Doctor Irion, then postmaster, is one of the most elegant gentlemen in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that is the reason he is to be paid the money; all elegant men ought to be paid their claims. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. He looks as much like Andrew Jackson as you ever saw a man; he is one of the highest Masons in the State of Tennessee; one of the finest types of southern manhood and chivalry you ever saw. He was paying his own rent, but, on inspection of the post-office by a post-office inspector, it was condemned, and he was ordered to rent another building. He did rent it at the price of $15 a month for one year. In his letter, incorporated in this report, which is sworn to, he states these facts, and there is an affidavit of the gentleman who rented the place to him, W. P. Smallwood, who swears that he collected the rent of him for one year. Now, this affidavit states that when he sent his vouchers in for the payment, the appropriation had been exhausted for that year. He has been trying to get this without an act of Congress ever since that time, and I have been assisting him. Afterwards the Post-Office authorities suggested to me a private act of Congress, and that is why this bill is here.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, how soon are the records destroyed after they are made?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will bear this in mind, that he sent his vouchers in, but the appropriation was exhausted, and it was not paid. The gentleman will observe that this is a small claim. He did not want to put it in the hands of an attorney, and this old gentleman worked along by himself trying to get his pay.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is right, we ought to put the Post-Office Department on trial. Do I understand that the gentleman says that this postmaster sent his vouchers into the Post-Office Department, and before they were allowed or disposed of the Post-Office Department destroyed them?

Mr. SIMS. He swears here that he sent it in at the end of the year, but the appropriation out of which it should be paid had been exhausted.

Mr. MANN. What has become of these vouchers which were sent to the Post-Office Department? They do not take wings and fly away.

Mr. SIMS. The proper authority in the Post-Office Department says the records have been destroyed by fire or otherwise.

Mr. MANN. No; destroyed by act of Congress.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; by act of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to assert that the Post-Office Department destroys vouchers which are sent to it before they are acted upon or that there is any act of Congress which requires the Post-Office Department to destroy the evidence of these things before they are disposed of?

Mr. SIMS. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. MANN. That is the result of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SIMS. But the letters of the officers referred to in the report state these have been destroyed in part, but the ledger, the journal, or the books show that he never was paid anything for rent.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman wish the House to believe that when vouchers have been sent to the Post-Office Department, the Post-Office Department so construed the act of Congress that it disposes of those vouchers before it acts upon them?

Mr. SIMS. Why, no; I do not.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is the result of the gentleman's position.

Mr. SIMS. No; I said the records had been destroyed in pursuance of act of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Where are the vouchers, then?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman swears they are lost, but he brings up the gentleman who collected the rent from him and owned the building, and he swears he did collect it and that Doctor Irion paid it to him.

Mr. MANN. We do not doubt the gentleman paid the rent. The gentleman says he sent the vouchers to the Post-Office Department for the rent. What has become of them?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think the gentleman ought to find out before he brings this bill before the House.

Mr. SIMS. If I can get this bill passed I shall not worry any further about these vouchers [laughter], because I have all the confidence that this money was paid that I have that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has addressed this House this afternoon.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well! The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], who is always on my side of the fence, except when he himself is specially interested——

Mr. SIMS. I am still on the gentleman's side. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Not just now. The gentleman has got over on the other side reaching to get—not for himself, because that he would not do—some money out of the Treasury for one of his constituents without making a case. If the gentleman had vouchers, if the postmaster were entitled to money, if he had sent vouchers to the Post-Office Department, those vouchers would be extant now. They would not have disappeared in the night. They would be there.

Mr. SIMS. This gentleman swears that he has lost them.

Mr. MANN. No; but the gentleman from Tennessee stated not that he had lost them, but that he had sent them to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; well, he has not got them. They are lost or destroyed; it makes no difference. They are not in existence.

Mr. MANN. Well, the presumption is that if they were in existence they would be in the Post-Office Department. Not being in the Post-Office Department the presumption is that they never existed.

Mr. SIMS. We do not have to deal in presumptions. We have the positive sworn testimony of two men above suspicion or reproach.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, we have a sworn statement here that this man who is represented to the committee as being an honorable gentleman, and we have no reason to disbelieve that statement, sent these vouchers to the Post-Office Department. We addressed a letter to the Department asking that all information concerning this case be sent to the Committee on Claims. The Post-Office Department sent the information they had and with that information the statement that all the original records in this case had been destroyed by act of Congress, so, taking that statement and these affidavits as being true, we ask that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. STINER & SONS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5167) for the relief of William H. Stiner & Sons.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, all regular duties having been paid, to remit the penal or additional duties, amounting to $781.20, incurred under section 32 of the tariff act approved July 24, 1897, growing out of the appraisement of certain 100 packages of palm-leaf hats consigned to William H. and Martin E. Stiner, composing the copartnership of William H. Stiner & Sons, imported at New York on or about August 10, 1903, from Veracruz, Mexico, on board the steamship Vigilancia, on and for the account of Messrs. Longini & Brenheim, of San Antonio, in the State of Texas.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the best explanation that can be given of this bill is the letter of the Secretary, which I will read.

It appears that in August, 1903, William H. Stiner & Sons, of New York, imported at that port from Messrs. Longini & Bernheim, of San Antonio, Tex., certain Mexican palm hats; that the merchandise was entered as of the value of $3,051, and was appraised as of the value of $3,720; that the appraiser's advance carried with it additional duty of 21 per cent, amounting to $781.20, under section 7 of the act of June 10, 1890, as amended by section 32 of the act of July 24, 1897; that application was duly made to the Treasury Department for remission of the additional duties, but as manifest clerical error, the only ground upon which relief might be granted, was not apparent the application was denied.

As stated in my letter addressed to you under date of the 8th of December last, I do not doubt the good faith of the transaction, and as the importers, Stiner & Sons, are a reputable and long-established firm, doing a large custom-house business in the city of New York, I perceive no objection to the Congress granting them the desired relief.

The bill inclosed, with your letter, is herewith returned.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is really a bad measure. The law used to provide that the Secretary of the Treasury might waive penalties which were imposed upon a person making a declaration of entry understating the valuation of the article. Now, we all understand very well that there is a disposition in human nature, in declaring the value of something upon which a tax is based upon a percentge basis, to put the value down. It became quite a custom on the part of persons importing goods into this country to enter their goods at a valuation somewhat below the actual value, and when penalties were imposed those persons appeared with their affidavits and with their evidence before the Secretary of the Treasury, who was authorized to waive the penalty, and, with ex parte statements and pressure of such distinguished Members of Congress as my friend from Texas, the Treasury Department usually waived those penalties, and thereupon Congress passed a new act providing that the Secretary could waive no penalties imposed for undervaluation, except it was by reason of manifest clerical error——

Mr. SLAYDEN. And a good law.

Mr. MANN. But that if a man, by accident or clerical error of his clerk, entered the goods at less than their value, then the Secretary might waive the penalty for the forfeiture; but unless it was done by manifest clerical error he could not do so. Now, this proposition is a proposition to repeal that law in this case. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the case the gentleman has in mind is not at all parallel to this. There has been no undervaluation by the importers of the products at all, and I think if the gentleman will permit me to make a statement of the facts in the case——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am satisfied he will be for the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am for the bill if the gentleman can convince me that it is right.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will state the facts. Messrs. Longini & Bernheim, of San Antonio, Tex., are importers of hats. They buy in the interior of Mexico, and at places remote from the railroad, a great many so-called "palm hats," which are really made out of straw which grows out there. Many of these hats are made away back in the Indian pueblos, or villages, a ahundred and fifty and two hundred miles from the railroad.

As stated in that part of the report by Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina, who made it, this consignment of hats was assembled at the city of Vera Cruz and shipped to New York. Messrs. Stiner & Sons, the nominal beneficiaries of this bill, are customs brokers. Every fact covering the transaction was sent with it. There was absolutely no undervaluation. The exact cost of all the stuff was submitted to the custom-house collectors, and has entirely satisfied the Secretary of the Treasury, the assistant secretary in charge of customs, and the collector at the city of New York. There was no undervaluation made. There had been a fluctuation in the market value of it, due to the fact that about that time the American people were crazy on so-called "Panama hats," and all hats of that character were advanced in price, but it did not affect the purchase price of these at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the collector of customs in the city of New York, and the solicitor for the collector have both recommended, in letters that were filed with this committee, that the penalty assessed against these gentlemen be not collected. And although this transaction occurred some time ago, so strongly convinced were the collector and the solicitor for the collector at New York, and the Secretary of the Treasury, that the fine assessed against these gentlemen should not be collected, they have suspended the claim against them, retaining, as I understand is the custom of the Department under such circumstances, one case of hats in order to keep the account open. It is strongly recommended that the bill be passed, and they assured me at the Treasury Department that if they had the power, which was denied them by the law referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, they would themselves grant the relief. I am told, Mr. Chairman, that this impressed the members of the committee so favorably that it came out with a unanimous report. Those "watchdogs of the Treasury," the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Florida, were both convinced that if there was one good bill on this Calendar it was the bill which I had the honor to introduce.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] does not fully appreciate the extent of his bill. When the appraisement was made in this case, these people had a remedy provided in the statute. They did not have to accept the appraisement made by the appraiser who fixed the valuation on these hats. The customs statute provides a method by which a decision of the appraiser can be appealed from. These people have their remedy provided by the statute. Has it come to the point that a man who imports goods, who fails to comply with the provision of the statute, can then come to Congress and ask Congress to pay back to him the money which under the law he is compelled to pay upon the importation? Now, I can understand very well how the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] can favor such a bill, because he believes that taking any money for import duties from this man is robbery. He believes that the Government has no right to take one cent from the man. He believes that when the Government collects the import duties at all it is stealing from the man. I have often heard my distinguished friend from Texas roll off his lips in mellifluous tones the word "robbery," as applied to the tariff duties. Does this side of the House believe that when a man fails to comply with the provisions of the law, fails to have the property appraised in the manner provided by the law, when he has violated the law, Congress shall step in and pay to him the money which the law says he shall pay to the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

F. H. DRISCOLL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10584) for the relief of F. H. Driscoll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to F. H. Driscoll, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $80, in full payment for services rendered the United States of America, not otherwise remunerated, as follows: As storekeeper-gauger in charge of special bonded warehouse No. 6, first district of California, for a period of twenty days during the month of May, A. D. 1897, at $4 per diem.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation, unless there is some objection to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to pay a salary to a man who was not entitled to it, and I do not wonder that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] has moved to lay it aside without an explanation. It will not bear explaining. I think the gentleman from Kansas ought to make the best effort at it he can.

Mr. MILLER. In order to please the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I will do the very best I can. This provides that F. H. Driscoll be paid the sum of $80 for services rendered the United States as storekeeper-gauger in charge of special bonded warehouse No. 6, first district of California, for a period of twenty days during the month of May, 1897, at $4 a day; and the only reason he has not been paid for his faithful services was the fact that there were complications in the accounts of Hon. O. N. Welburn, the late collector of that district, and the gauger was not paid for the time specified. Now if this explanation is satisfactory, I am ready for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

CHARLES L. ALLEN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13946) for the relief of Charles L. Allen.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to Charles L. Allen, of New York, N. Y., a duplicate in lieu of United States 4 per cent registered bond of the funded loan of 1907, No. 141694, for $100, inscribed in his name, and alleged to have been lost after having been assigned in blank: Provided, That the said Charles L. Allen shall first file in the Treasury a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said registered bond and the interest that would accrue thereon to the date of its maturity, with good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss because of the lost bond herein described.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Before that motion is put I desire to ask if there is not some general provision of law under which this remedy may be had?

Mr. MILLER. There is no general provision of the law. The general provision of the law provides for the issuing of duplicates in cases where the bond has been lost before having been assigned in blank, but none after having been assigned in blank.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. While a member of that committee, I do not recollect as clearly as I wish I could as to that particular bill; and if the gentleman from Kansas will permit the criticism, I will suggest now that the reports that accompany these bills ought to be a little more extensive than they are. There is scarcely a report made here that clearly shows the House what the matter under consideration is, and certainly in this instance it does not. What I am saying is not intended to apply only to this particular bill, but to most of the bills that are reported here. The gentleman from Kansas, who is chairman of this committee, takes it for granted that because we have passed upon these measures that Members of the House are as familiar with them as we are. I believe that is a misconception of our duty. I think every one of these bills ought to be examined with care, and whatever it has of merit or demerit ought to be pointed out, so that every Member of the House can intelligently cast his vote for it or against it, and not vote for a measure simply because it is reported by the committee. I presume most of the Members of the House would be guided by the gentleman from Kansas, but, after all, that is not right. It is the duty of every Member to know why he should vote for it or why he should vote against a bill, and in order to do so I want to suggest to the honorable chairman of our committee that it would be entirely appropriate that fuller reports should be made, showing fully what the facts are.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the criticism of the gentleman from Missouri, I deire to say this: That I would have been surprised if any other member of the committee should have asked the question the gentleman from Missouri asked. He is a member of the Committee on Claims. It is his duty to familiarize himself with every bill before that committee, and he ought to know exactly what is in it before it comes to the House. If he had read this report, he would have found in it the very question answered that he asks, and I will read it:

Mr. Allen made application to this Department for the issue of a duplicate bond, but the application was refused on the ground that there was no authority of law for the issue of a duplicate in cases where the original bond had been lost after having been assigned in blank.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

BLANK & PARKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4580) for the relief of Blank & Parks, of Waxahachie, Tex.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4580) for the relief of Blank & Parks, of Waxahachie, Tex.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Blank & Parks, of Waxahachie, Tex., the sum of $400, paid under protest to the collector of internal revenue at Dallas, Tex., said payment having been demanded and payment required under threats of restraint and sale of said Blank & Parks's property in consequence of a technical violation of the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a brief explanation of this bill. Blank & Parks were butchers in my home town of Waxahachie, Tex. In the same town there was a restaurant keeper. Blank & Parks were preparing to order a carload or an amount of meat products from Swift & Co., or some other factory. The restaurant man came to them and asked them to include in their order 40 pounds of oleomargarine for his use. They did so. The shipment was made. When the goods were delivered the draymen carried the oleomargarine to the restaurant man, and it was never in the butcher shop of the claimants in this case at all. He delivered it to the restaurant, and it was used by the restaurant men. No profit was charged. The restaurant keeper paid just what Blank & Parks were charged for it by the packers. This was one transaction. It is possible that there was another transaction of the same nature, but in any event not more than the two. After these transactions, if there were two, Blank & Parks discovered that they violated the internal-revenue laws of the United States, or rather that the Government was demanding of them the payment of $400 as tax as wholesale dealers in oleomargarine. They had never ordered any before that time, and never ordered any after that time. They made no profit and were not cognizant of the fact that this ordering of oleomargarine constituted them wholesale dealers in oleomargarine. The Government demanded payment of $400 tax and $200 penalty. This claim was suspended for two or three years, awaiting a decision of the United States court upon a similar case. In the district court the decision was that the facts in that case, practically the same as in this, did not constitute the party ordering the oleomargarine a dealer, and consequently that he was not subject to the tax and penalty. The United States Government appealed it to the circuit court of appeals, and finally there was a decision to the effect that the party ordering was technically a dealer in oleomargarine and under the letter of the statute would be liable for the tax. The Government finally remitted the penalty of $200, but collected from these men, these butchers, $400 tax for ordering, as an act of accommodation for a customer in their town, 80 pounds of oleomargarine. If the restaurant keeper had ordered it for himself he would not have been subject to any tax and not have been liable to the Government for anything, but for ordering it simply as an act of accommodation for another, in ignorance of the fact that by doing so they were technically making themselves liable, the Government collected $400 from these claimants.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that. I dislike to appear on this floor against so many of these bills, but this, like the others, has that intrinsic defect that ought to invite the opposition of every man who carefully does his duty as a Member of this House. Here is a man in the gentleman's town who made some purchases of oleomargarine under conditions that the revenue officers determined constituted him a dealer. That was the opinion of the collector of internal revenue, that he was a dealer and subject to the payment of that tax. He did not accept the determination of the revenue officer, but this claimant took this matter into court and sought an adjudication as to whether or not he was a dealer within the meaning of the law and therefore required to pay a dealer's tax.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Would the gentleman permit me to correct him in this? These parties did not take the case into court, but elsewhere there was a case in the United States court.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman is correct that this particular case did not get into court, but the next case on this Calendar, immediately following it, was carried into the district court, and the determination of the district court of the United States taken thereon as to whether these parties were dealers. Not being content with that, it was carried up to the circuit court of appeals, I believe, where the court did determine that these people were dealers within the meaning of the law and therefore required to pay the tax in such cases.

Now, what did they do? They paid it, just as thousands of others have done all over this country. But these two claimants here, unlike the balance of them, not content to be governed by the law, seek the assistance of their very efficient and able Congressman to come here and get this Congress to do what? To reach out its strong arm and suspend the law in order that these people may recover back the tax which the court has solemnly determined they were bound to pay under the admitted facts of the case. Now, what is that? That is asking Congress solemnly to suspend the law in order that some particular claimants may get favors here that are denied to other people situated precisely as the claimants are situated.

Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to inveigh against these claims as I do, but when I reflect that nearly every one of them comes upon that single proposition, saying, "We have no remedy; the law gives us no ground for a claim, and therefore we ask the Congress of the United States to reach out its almost omnipotent arm and suspend the law for our particular benefit, and we do not ask that others situated as we are be included in this matter of grace;" when I reflect that that is the situation here, I am constrained to make these objections.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the law provide a remedy by appeal from the local internal-revenue official to a board of appraisers or to a court to adjudicate this matter instead of having it brought here?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am not sure what the proceeding is, but they did successfully resort to some judicial proceeding by which it was taken into the courts and there determined that these parties were, in fact, dealers, and chargeable with the tax which they were required to pay. Not content with the judgment of one court, it was taken up to the higher Federal courts. I will not undertake to say how it got there, further than to say that the case was there legally, or it would not have been considered.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The district court held that they were not liable, but the Government appealed it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman says the district court held that they were not dealers, and the Government appealed to the appellate court and took the solemn judgment of that court, which was that within the meaning of the law they are dealers, that within the terms of this statute they are bound for the payment of that tax.

Now, what do they ask? That that law shall be repealed as to everybody situated as they are? No, indeed. No such request comes here, but they ask that this Congress shall suspend the law as a matter of grace to these particular claimants and give to them a right which they do not now have, give to them a right which is not accorded to others of their class, and you are required as Members of this House to vote whether or not you will extend these matters of grace to these claimants that is denied to the balance of the people who do not have the hardihood to ask that the law be set aside in their behalf.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Are the facts as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL]?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I take it for granted that they are. I will concede that the facts are as stated by the gentleman from Texas, that these purchases were made precisely as he says.

But will you say that a man shall not be governed by the law as determined by the courts; that after he has had his day in court, after he has fought it out to the last ditch and judgment has gone against him, that he can come to Congress and ask Congress to relieve him from the condition in which the law places him and from that condition in which the courts determine that the law places him? Are you going to say that Congress shall give to this particular individual with a swift, diligent Member of Congress behind him—that Congress shall give to him this individual claim that it denies to other people?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it not true that this claim has not been litigated?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This particular claim has not been litigated, but the very next case, which is precisely like it, has been litigated. The gentleman from Texas concedes that they both stand on the same footing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the gentleman contend that under the statement of facts made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] these people ought not to have their money back? Isn't it true that they ought to have this money?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I can only say that the law of the land, which ought to be the standard of living for every American citizen, provides that these people shall pay this tax. They claim they were not within the provisions of the law. They went into court and sought relief. The court determined that they were dealers within the meaning of the law and charged with the tax. Now they come here and ask Congress to suspend the operation of the law, suspend the judgment of the court, and give this money to them as a mere matter of favor.

I suppose they might say of them as the gentleman from Kansas said about other claimants here, that they are good citizens and possessed of the highest character. If you give him a little time he will come and say the same thing about these claimants. What is it? They ask us, as I say, to step in here, not for the benefit of the people of the country, not for the benefit of any class in the country, but for the benefit of the individual who has a diligent Congressman to push his case, to give as a matter of grace to one man that which is denied to another, and to pay which we have to levy a tax on the others.

Mr. HINSHAW. If the gentleman will allow me, is not the distinction this: Ordinarily a succession of deals constitutes a dealer. In this case they did not have but one single transaction, and therefore were not dealers.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No; I do not think that is the distinction. The distinction in this case is that the claimant says that he is not a dealer; the law says he is a dealer; the court says that he is a dealer, and now he comes to this House and asks Congress to set aside the law—set aside the judgment of the court—and give to these men by an ex post facto law the amount of their claim.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I want the members of the committee to understand exactly what is in this matter.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, if they can't understand it after what I have said they are hopeless. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. These men were in the meat market business and were not engaged in dealing in oleomargarine. They never were dealers in it, but as an accommodation to a man engaged in another business they ordered this oleomargarine for him, and it was held by the Department that he was a dealer in oleomargarine for that reason. Now, this case is like the one above, and I call attention to what the courts say in relation to that case:

The substantial and material facts are set forth in the decision of Judge Allen in 83 Federal Reporter, 1003. It appears that Mr. Hartzell acted in ordering the oleomargarine for the hotel keeper, Mr. Owens, simply as an accommodation.

Judge Allen said that—

"Hartzell's act was that of a mere agent for Owens. He simply agreed to guarantee payment of the price of the oleomargarine, stipulating at the time that he was to have nothing to do in handling or caring for it. In no event was he to receive one cent of gain or profit out of the transaction."

The Commissioner said it was a technical matter, but under the construction of the law by that office the liability of a dealer was incurred.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JUDD O. HARTZELL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7771) for the relief of Judd O. Hartzell.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Judd O. Hartzell, of Labarpe, Ill., the sum of $960, to reimburse him for said sum paid by him for a technical violation of the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is just exactly like the other one we have just passed. I have already read what the court said in relation to this matter.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is not only an improper allowance——

Mr. MILLER. This is exactly like the other one, except I think the tax was not remitted.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the case that is now under consideration is the precise case in which the court did enter the judgment to which I referred a moment ago.

Now, this bill contains a word I think ought to be stricken out, even if this bill is to be one of the pieces of pork put into this pork barrel. He says that it was a technical violation of the law. Now, I think that we ought to strike that word "technical" out, and at the proper time I will move that it be done. I will offer that amendment. It is not a technical violation of the law. It is a substantial violation of the law. It is a refusal to comply with the revenue laws of the country as they are written upon the pages of our statute books. It is the same sort of a law that is violated when a man goes into the State of Kansas and offers to sell whisky without having a Government license. One sale would be as bad as one million so far as he was concerned. If a man went into the district of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER], who advocates this measure, and sold one-half pint of whisky without having taken out a Government license he would be brought into court and punished, and the gentleman from Kansas would be the last man to come to Congress and ask that a bill be enacted refunding to him the amount he had paid out as fine and costs for having violated the revenue laws by selling a half pint of whisky in Kansas.

Suppose that he said the man to whom he sold it had been bitten by a snake and that he had sold it to him in order to relieve him from the distress in which he found himself. Even then he would be hauled into court and he would be indicted by a grand jury. He would be arraigned before a judge and he would be convicted and the gentleman from Kansas would not be found hanging around this House asking that an appropriation be made to pay back to him the amount of his fine and costs, because he had a "good character" and had not sold but to one man. No, Mr. Chairman, I only indulge in these seemingly intemperate remarks [laughter]—seemingly intemperate—hoping that I may arrest the attention of this House, and if not arrest the attention of the House at least arrest the attention of the country, so that it may observe the kind of legislation that we are indulging in here. Each one of us is bringing up under our protecting arm some of our constituents for whom we feel a little more tenderness than we do for the rest. That is what this House is doing. It is a travesty upon the Constitution and upon the dignity of this country that such bills as this claim the attention of the House. What are they? They are bills to relieve some man from paying the penalty of his bond or to enable some man to recover back duty or revenue that he has been compelled to pay according to law, or asking us to waive the statute of limitations or some other statute that the wisdom of this House has enacted for the protection of the people. That is what we are here for. To suspend the law, to arrrest and set aside its operation, and for what? For the benefit of the country? No; but to tax the country for the benefit of some favorite claimant who has a Congressman who will press his claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

G. F. TARBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7961) for the relief of G. F. Tarbell.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,540.73 be paid to G. F. Tarbell, of Boston, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, said sum having been exacted as duties and paid to the collector of customs at the port of Boston by the said Tarbell on the 3d day of December, 1902, covering a consignment of 144 head of cattle shipped from Canada in bond via Boston, Mass., to Liverpool, England, on the 25th day of November, 1902, and being prohibited from being so shipped by general orders from the Department of Agriculture, dated the 27th day of November, 1902, said cattle being then slaughtered and exported on the Cestrian on the 10th day of December, 1902.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to make payment of said amount of $2,540.73, mentioned in section 1, out of the funds not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect on its passage.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL].

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, Mr. G. F. Tarbell exported from Canada, to go through the States of Vermont and Massachusetts to Boston and thence for exportation to Europe, 144 cattle. Those cattle were in bond and not subject to any tax by the United States. Upon their arrival, however, in Boston it appeared that there was a great deal of excitement over the foot-and-mouth disease, which then prevailed to some extent among the domestic cattle in that State. These cattle, however, which were being exported by Mr. Tarbell were entirely free from that disease and came from a section of the country where the disease did not exist. They were sound cattle, but on account of the great excitement that was then prevailing by reason of that disease existing in Massachusetts the Department of Agriculture stepped in and prohibited the exportation of those cattle. There was but one thing that Mr. Tarbell could do. Those cattle had got to be slaughtered in order to be exported, because they could not be returned again to Canada without paying the tax by so doing. They were slaughtered, and thereupon the Government assessed upon the carcasses of those cattle, which were then exported——

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman pardon me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think the gentleman is not quite fairly stating the case. Before the cattle could be slaughtered—before they could be taken out of bond—the duties had to be paid.

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes; exactly. The duties had to be paid, and then they were slaughtered. But a protest was made, and I wish to read a few lines from the report which was made. Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, this is a very recent case.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What is the date of that protest?

Mr. TIRRELL. The date of that protest is the 5th of May, 1903.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. When were these cattle slaughtered?

Mr. TIRRELL. The purchase was made before the tax was paid. The cattle were slaughtered, I think, in November. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury says in regard to this case:

This is a case of peculiar hardship, and the claim for relief is based on strong equitable grounds. The owner imported the animals in good faith for exportation to Liverpool, and, being in transit through the United States, no duty attached. He was prevented from shipping them as cattle and was required to slaughter them, and although he exported the carcasses they were not exported as cattle, and therefore the act of transit through the United States was vitiated. He could not return them to Canada because the slaughter of the animals in the United States was required; he could not claim a drawback of the duties paid because under the drawback laws there must be a manufacture in the United States from imported material, and the mere slaughter of animals and dressing of carcasses is not, as ruled by the courts, considered a manufacture.

The Department therefore recommends this bill to the favorable consideration of your committee.

Respectfully, L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

ESTATE OF SAMUEL LEE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 850) making appropriation to pay the estate of Samuel Lee, deceased, in full for any claim for pay and allowances made by reason of the election of said Lee to the Forty-seventh Congress and his services therein.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal representative of the estate of Samuel Lee, deceased, the sum of $10,482.80, the same being in full for any claim for pay and allowances made by reason of the election of said Lee to the Forty-seventh Congress and his services therein.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out on line 4, after word "legal," all of said line, and on line 5 all of line up to word "the." Insert in lieu thereof the words "representatives of the estate of Samuel Lee, deceased, to wit, Samuel Lee, Anna Lee Andrews, Clarence Lee, Robert Lee, Harry A. Lee, and Phillip Lee, heirs at law."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill making appropriation to pay the legal representatives of the estate of Samuel Lee, deceased, to wit, Samuel Lee, Anna Lee Andrews, Clarence Lee, Robert Lee, Harry A. Lee, and Phillip Lee, heirs at law, in full for any claims for pay and allowances made by reason of the election of said Lee to the Forty-seventh Congress and his services therein."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the facts in this case are that in 1882, at an election for a Representative in Congress from the First Congressional district, in the State of South Carolina——

Mr. KEIFER. That should be 1880.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman from Ohio says this should be 1880. This report says 1882.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is right in making the statement; I have the marked record here.

Mr. KEIFER. Members of that Congress were elected in 1880; 1880 is the time of the election.

Mr. MILLER. Well, I will not put the exact time, although I got the date from the record.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized upon this bill for a few minutes.

Mr. MILLER. The facts are that at the election for Congress to which I have called attention in the First Congressional district of South Carolina one John S. Richardson was a candidate for Congress, and upon the face of the returns his election was indicated. There was a contest for his seat by one Samuel Lee, who was a candidate for election at the same time. That contest was referred to the Committee on Elections of the House, and the Forty-seventh Congress in passing upon the report of the committee—I will say there were two reports—the report of the majority of the committee recommended that Samuel Lee be allowed to withdraw his papers and that the case be dismissed without prejudice. The minority report favored the election of Mr. Lee, and two resolutions followed. One resolution was that Mr. John S. Richardson was not elected and was not entitled to a seat as a Member of the Forty-seventh Congress, and the second resolution was that Mr. Lee was elected and was entitled to his seat as a Member of the Forty-seventh Congress. A motion was made to substitute the minority report for the report of the majority, and that motion was adopted by the House of Representatives in the Forty-seventh Congress by a vote of 124 to 114, and a motion was made to reconsider, and that motion laid upon the table. Afterwards another question arose as to the question upon the final vote after the substitute had been adopted, and then immediately the question was discussed, and very fully, too, by the gentlemen who engaged in filibustering from that hour until the close of that session.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was through with his statement, but I understood the gentleman to say that the Committee on Elections reported in favor of seating Mr. Lee.

Mr. MILLER. The minority of the Committee on Elections reported in favor of the seating of Mr. Lee and the minority report was moved as a substitute for the majority report, and that minority report was adopted by the House.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Elections reported against the right of Mr. Lee to his seat, as I understand it.

Mr. MILLER. The majority of the Committee on Elections reported suggesting that no further action be taken in the matter and that Mr. Lee be allowed to withdraw his papers, which of course would have permitted Mr. Richardson to have retained his seat. Those are the facts in the case. And the minority of the committee made a report in favor of the contestant, Mr. Lee, and that minority report was adopted as a substitute for the majority report by 124 to 114. And then, as I said, filibustering commenced and continued until the close of the session, and he was not sworn in and his name put upon the roll, and hence he could not draw his salary. But the Forty-seventh Congress, having by a vote of 124 to 114 decided that Mr. Richardson was not elected and was not entitled to his seat, and he having drawn a salary of $10,000 to which he was not entitled, this committee was of the opinion that the man who was honestly elected in that district at that election, as found by the vote of the Forty-seventh Congress, was entitled to the salary of the Member from that district.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. I wanted to ask whether it appears anywhere that Samuel Lee or his estate ever drew any pay on account of the expense of the contest?

Mr. MILLER. I am not sure about that.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman know anything about it?

Mr. MILLER. I could not find from an examination of the record, so far as I could follow that record, any claim of any kind he had ever presented or ever received it on.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand—and I have been looking through the index—that he did not. Now, on the other hand, is it not a fact that, under the existing law at that time, Mr. Richardson not only drew his salary—and I think that was right in view of the situation—but he drew $2,000 on account of his expenses of contest?

Mr. MILLER. That is true also.

Mr. KEIFER. The question does not always arise merely about the party's rights, as I understand it—if you will allow me—to be paid back salary, if you please, but they are certainly entitled according to the general custom to something on account of the expenses of the contest, although it is not as successful as this promises to be.

In the case of Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, I think we broke the rule of the law, which was then fixed at $2,000, and paid him $4,000, although he was not successful. I think this case is stronger than the mere claim that Samuel Lee should be paid the back salary. You have got something over $400 in the bill that, it is said, is on account of some actual expenses. It may be mileage, perhaps. This case has been accurately stated by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Claims in a general way. A majority of the Committee on Elections in the Forty-seventh Congress reported this resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel Lee have leave to withdraw his papers, and this case is dismissed without prejudice.

What that meant at the time the report was made, I do not know. But that was the report made by a majority of the committee.

Mr. MILLER. Let me ask the distinguished gentleman from Ohio if that did not mean that the sitting Member was to retain his seat?

Mr. KEIFER. That follows, as a matter of course. But they did not pass upon that question. There was a difference of opinion in the committee as to whether or not the sitting Member should remain and occupy his seat.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Was Samuel Lee ever sworn in?

Mr. KEIFER. Lee was never sworn in. If you will listen to me for a moment I think I can make it clear, if it has not already been made so. The question of the contest did not come up before the Forty-seventh Congress for vote until the 3d day of March, 1883. Then a motion was made to substitute for the rest of the resolution I have just read the report of the minority—that is, the resolutions offered by the minority. The first one was "that John S. Richardson was not elected"—I will not read the whole of it—and the second, "that Samuel Lee was duly elected as Representative," and then following in the usual language. The previous question was ordered on the report, including the motion to adopt the substitute for the committee's report. The previous question included a vote upon both of these resolutions.

When the vote was taken before the House, the vote stood in favor of substituting these two resolutions for the report of the majority of the committee, by 124 to 114, as stated by the chairman of the committee. Then the vote recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as including the substitute. The motion that carried by 124 to 114 only substituted these two resolutions for the resolution of the committee. Then the motion was submitted to the House on the adoption of the resolution substituted.

On that vote being taken, it stood 128 to 6; and then commenced the work of filibustering, the most remarkable in character; but the filibustering was done by claiming that there was no quorum, and yea-and-nay votes were called all the balance of the day and all the night of the 3d of March, 1883, with a short recess between 6 and 9 o'clock on the 4th. The filibustering went on to prevent the majority of the House from seating Samuel Lee. At that time, although it was the opinion of the Speaker that he had a right to count a quorum, and so stated in the course of this filibustering, he did not do it, because on the Republican side of the House the distinguished leaders, like the later Speaker of this House, Mr. Reed, and Mr. Robinson, of Massachusetts, and others, were on record in speeches of considerable length against the power and right of the Speaker to count a quorum. That was the only reason it was not done. If anybody is curious to look into this subject, they will find quite a history of it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 13, part 5, page 4313.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to know if the Mr. Richardson in that contest had the same political affiliations as the majority of the Members of the House?

Mr. KEIFER. No; I think not. That House was somewhat peculiar. At the time it elected its Speaker neither party of this country had a majority in the House. The Democrats, Greenbackers, and Readjusters combined outnumbered the Republicans when the Forty-seventh Congress opened.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. What was the political complexion of the Committee on Elections?

Mr. KEIFER. I think that was Republican.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And that Republican committee—the majority—reported in favor of Richardson?

Mr. KEIFER. In favor of the resolutions that I have quoted. And the general judgment of the committee, as I understand it, was that neither was elected, so the matter was delayed, and consequently it came up at the last of the session.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And now the proposition is to go back twenty years to correct the report of the majority of that committee.

Mr. KEIFER. No; that is not the proposition. Here is the proposition: Samuel Lee was declared in effect elected to the Forty-seventh Congress on the day before the adjournment of that Congress; but through the methods that I have spoken of he was not given a seat. I would be better satisfied with this report, for the benefit of the children of the deceased Samuel Lee, if they had reported what was customary then, and I presume ever since, a propor appropriation to pay the contestant's expenses; and there was a limitation at that time that applied to the contestant and contestee, regardless of what was right, giving $2,000 for their expenses. I know that on account of the peculiar character of one contest that came before the House, that I was quite familiar with, that we were willing that the sum should be made very much larger.

I do not think we can go back to correct this any further than that we properly consider here all the facts in determining what should be allowed to the children of Samuel Lee. He is dead; his widow is dead, as I understand. These people are poor, and they have never received anything. The contestant, as I understand, did, though I am not absolutely certain, because I can not verify it. He drew his expenses for this contest, if at all, rightfully—I mean to say, under the state of the law as it existed then, and I am not perfectly certain what the law is on the subject now, whether we have any at all; but we had at that time. This bill gives substantially the same to these children that their father should have received had he been seated as he should have been, as the vote showed.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that the law now provides that the election expenses, or the expenses of both the contestant and the contestee, shall be paid by Congress, not to exceed $2,000. The law is the same; and it provides that these expenses shall be audited by the Committee on Elections. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I can very readily see that in this case, the matter not being settled until the final adjournment of Congress, that the bill for the expenses might not have been presented at that Congress.

Mr. KEIFER. Could not possibly be.

Mr. MANN. Might not have been presented to the subsequent Congress.

Mr. KEIFER. It could not possibly be presented by way of appropriation for the session at all, because the filibustering went on, with some little grace between times for the purpose of submitting bills, and so on, until the close, as the clock struck 12 on the 4th of March, 1883.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, it was quite possible to present the bill at that session of Congress.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no; that Congress ended then.

Mr. MANN. Because when the bill amounts to $2,000 that is all they can get, and all they have to do, whether the contest is settled or not, is to present the proper bills, receipted, to the Committee on Elections, which will certify the amount.

Mr. KEIFER. If they had anticipated and introduced a bill before the contest was settled, that could have been done. The gentleman is right to that extent. I think this is a proper case for an appropriation of money, but I do not mean to say that we can now correct that record any further than that we ought to make the appropriation for these heirs at law who are named in the bill.

Mr. BONYNGE. Can the gentleman state when the claim was first presented to Congress for allowance?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman had better ask that question of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Claims, or some one else, because I do not know. I have been absent some since then. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. In answer to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE], I desire to say that this bill has been before Congress for a long time. In the Fifty-fourth Congress, in 1897, this bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims of this House. In 1899 it was again favorably reported by the Committee on Claims, by Mr. RIXEY, of Virginia. In the Fifty-sixth Congress it was reported by Mr. NEEDHAM, of California, from the Committee on Claims. In 1903, in the Fifty-seventh Congress, it was reported by Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, and in the Fifty-eighth Congress Mr. FOSTER of Vermont again reported this bill. In this Congress it comes with the report of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BONYNGE. Was 1897 the first time it was presented to Congress?

Mr. MILLER. That is the first time it was reported. It was before Congress for years before that time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is true that under the law if a contestant in an election case be seated by the House on the last day of the session, he becomes technically entitled to the pay for his term, $10,000. It is also true that it is only a technicality which gives him the right to the money. He has not earned it, he has not performed the services for which the pay is given. Under the law, if he is sworn in, he becomes technically entitled to the money; but here is a case where the person was not sworn in, not declared elected, where the committee of the House which investigated the matter reported against his right to the seat. Now, the gentlemen of the House ought to understand that in former days the House, probably more than now it had become more or less of a custom to delay some contested election cases, which were without merit, until the final hours of the session of Congress, and then for a partisan majority at times to put the contestant in as a Member of Congress, for the very purpose of taking $10,000 out of the Treasury and handing it to him as a gift. In recent years the Committees on Elections in the House have not adopted that policy. They have taken up the contested election cases which have been presented before them, and have reported to the House in time for the consideration of the contest.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has somewhat anticipated my question, whether it has not been true, in some sense, in every Congress for the last fifty years almost, that somebody was seated late in the session, if not in the last hours of the session, and given the full pay?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that it has not been done since I have been a Member of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. There have been numerous cases where gentlemen have been seated in the second session.

Mr. MARSHALL. Was not the Butler case, from St. Louis, in the second session?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Butler case, from St. Louis, was where Mr. Butler had been unseated once, and was elected again just before the second session of Congress, and it was necessary to pass on his case at the second sesion if it was passed upon at all; but the original contest had been disposed of at the first session of Congress; and the Committees on Elections do not adopt the policy, which formerly prevailed, of putting off the decision of a contest until the final hours of Congress. That is not the custom of the Committees on Elections—any of them—to-day, as I understand it.

Mr. PAYNE. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's side of the case, but I do not think he ought to base his argument upon what I think is a false assumption of facts. I think it has always been the custom when a man is unseated and another man sworn in to pay him the full salary.

Mr. MANN. I said so. I just stated that it was the law that when a man was seated, even if he were sworn in five minutes before the final adjournment of Congress, he became entitled to that $10,000 as a matter of technicality. The gentleman from New York did not hear all that I stated.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I was misled by the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman says, as a matter of technicality, he is entitled to $10,000. Here a man is elected to Congress; he comes here ready to take his seat and do his duty, and he is refused his seat until the last hour. Why isn't he entitled to the salary the same as if he had served? The gentleman calls it a technicality. I say it is not a technicality; he has earned his money.

Mr. MANN. I yielded to the gentleman to ask a question, but I am glad to have his opinion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact. The gentleman from Ohio stated that the contestant in that case had never been paid his election expenses. In that statement the gentleman from Ohio was in error. The appropriation bill which carried all the expenses for the various contestants and contestees for the Forty-seventh Congress carried an appropriation of $2,000 for Samuel Lee.

Mr. KEIFER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I said I had not been able to find it. I looked at all the indexes that were brought me, and I did not find it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have the record here.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, I do not dispute the gentleman if he has the record before him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I do not make a statement which can not be borne out by the record. I will not follow the example of my distinguished friend.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it would have been better if the gentleman from Ohio had had the record before him before he made his statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I said at the time that I had been unable to find the record. I sent for all the indexes, but did not find it. Perhaps it was my fault.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me? I desire to say that in the United States Statutes at Large, Forty-seventh Congress, volume 22, page 339, are "the parties named below, the amounts stated opposite their names in full for expenses incurred by them, respectively, in contested-election cases, which amount shall be immediately available, namely, to the estate of James Gillett," etc., and amongst them to Samuel Lee, $2,000.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will remember that I asked the chairman of the committee whether they had found any list, and he said they had not.

Mr. MANN. That shows the extreme care the Committee on Claims exercised in investigating this matter. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the facts are that the Committee on Elections considered the case of Lee v. Richardson, and although it was composed of a majority of Republicans, although Mr. Lee was a Republican and Mr. Richardson was a Democrat, the committee, with a majority of Republicans, decided that Lee was not elected to Congress and Mr. Richardson had a right to retain his seat.

Mr. KEIFER. There was no such resolution reported.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman says no such resolution was reported. The resolution was that Mr. Lee be authorized——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will read the resolution; I have it here.

Mr. MANN. I have the resolution. The resolution from the majority of the committee was that Samuel Lee had leave to withdraw his papers, and that this case is dismissed without prejudice. The effect of this was that the committee decided that Lee was not elected a Member of Congress and Richardson was entitled to retain his seat.

Now, what did the House do? The House first voted to adopt the substitute resolution offered by the minority. The minority offered a substitute, which was that Lee was elected and Richardson was not elected. The original resolution was amended by adopting the substitute. Then a vote was taken on the original resolution as amended, and that prevailed, and a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted, and that motion never was disposed of. Now, the minority of the House has a right to have a motion to reconsider disposed of just as much as it has to have the original resolution disposed of.

Mr. KEIFER. Is anybody contesting the claim that the gentleman from Illinois is talking about? Nobody disputes that the minority had a right to have a vote on the proposition to reconsider. Does that touch the question involved here?

Mr. MANN. I do not know which side the gentleman from Ohio is on now. [Laughter.] A few moments ago he was opposed to $10,000 and in favor of paying the $2,000 of expenses, and that only. Now, the expenses having been paid, the gentleman from Ohio ought to be willing to contain his soul while I discuss the real question in the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. But the gentleman is discussing the question about the rights of the minority to have a vote upon a proposition that has no connection with this question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the minority had the right to have the question of reconsideration of the vote disposed of. That question never was disposed of. Mr. Lee never was declared by this House to be a Member of the House. No resolution was ever passed, in legal effect, declaring him to be a Member of the House, because until the question of reconsideration is disposed of the vote on the original proposition is not a legal vote to dispose of the matter.

Mr. PATTERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ELLERBE. I just want to suggest to the gentleman that if he will look closely he will find that when the final resolution was put as amended by the substitute that resolution never has been passed. Here is the record, if the gentleman desires to look at it.

Mr. KEIFER. That has been stated over and over again.

Mr. ELLERBE. It was not on the motion to reconsider, but the motion as amended by the substitute never was passed.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand that the filibustering that prevented a vote was not on the vote for a reconsideration, but was on a vote for the passage of the resolution as amended?

Mr. PATTERSON of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. That is the way I understood a moment ago.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not certain whether it was upon that motion or whether it was upon the original question as substituted. It makes no difference. There was no final vote. There never was any final action by the House. The time never came when this man could be sworn in as a Member of the House. He never had established his right to a seat in the House. It is true that a partisan majority in the House had voted to overrule the committee which considered his case, but the committee had decided against him, and the House decided against him, because it took no final action upon his election; and to say that he is entitled to be paid the salary for a two years' term in this House is to give him a gratuity which in no sense and in no way did he ever earn. This is not the first time that this case has been before this House. It is not the first time that I have helped to oppose this nefarious or unjust proposition. It is not the only case of the kind of very similar nature which has come before the House. There is no reason why the House should put a premium upon fake elections. He never was a Member of the House. He was paid his election expenses, and he is not entitled to a cent, and his family and descendants under no circumstances are entitled to a penny out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] for a moment.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, we got into some confusion about this vote, and all that has been said so often and repeated so much by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] must be set aside, I think. There was some attempt at filibustering over a motion to reconsider, but later the question came up squarely upon the adoption of the report of the committee as amended by the adoption of the substitute. Let me read a portion of the RECORD, volume 13, part 4, on page 3752. After a vote was taken, the result of the vote was then announced as above stated. Mr. Pettibone moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and that was the vote of 121 to 114, substituting the report of the minority.

Mr. PAYNE. That is amending the original resolution?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes. Then Mr. Pettibone moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended by the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. Townsend of Illinois and Mr. Atherton called for the yeas and nays.

They were both Democrats.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 6, not voting 157.

Then the filibustering commenced. There was no quorum.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the record is pretty fairly understood now, but what has the gentleman to say, and I think he is a competent witness upon that question, to the charge made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the Forty-seventh Congress was so biased from a partisan standpoint as to be incapable of doing justice in a case like this?

Mr. KEIFER. That needs no answer at all——

Mr. MANN. That statement was not made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KEIFER. Because filibustering took place there that prevented them from declaring the result. That was all.

That is all there is to be said, and the gentleman is mistaken about the committee. I think there were two Republican members of the committee who joined with the Democratic members and reported the resolution that has been so often read here, by myself in the first instance. A majority of the committee, so far as the Republicans were concerned, reported the resolutions which were adopted as a substitute. That is where it stood, that is the condition that it is in, and it is not very necessary to state over and over and over again, as the gentleman from Illinois has done, that the Member was not sworn in. Everybody said that from the beginning, and he was not sworn in because he could not be sworn in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why could he not be sworn in?

Mr. KEIFER. Because there was no declaration of the vote for want of a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And under the rules of the House at that time there had to be a quorum voting?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So under the rules of the House he had no right to have it declared?

Mr. KEIFER. He had no right to have it declared and no right to be sworn in, as I said in the other remarks I made.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how many Democratic members there were on that committee?

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I am not certain from memory, but I remember generally the facts I have stated.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has probabaly only recently examined the record.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I have hastily done it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I both stated a while ago, or rather I stated a while ago and he confirms it now, that the vote was taken upon the resolution as amended.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That announcement failed for want of a quorum, and yet the last thing that was done in that case was a motion to reconsider the last vote in the case.

Mr. KEIFER. That was after the final vote was taken, and on this question, for the purpose of trying to get out of the situation they were in and go on with other business.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but if they had gotten to a point where they were voting upon a proposition, what were they endeavoring to reconsider after that?

Mr. KEIFER. Well, the gentleman is trying to get into the state of mind that some Members of that Congress were in who wanted to get other bills which were on the Speaker's table from the Senate—amendments to House bills, etc., and all that—up and passed, instead of spending the last hours of the Forty-seventh Congress filibustering over a contested-election case. By reading the RECORD all through that will be very plain.

Mr. MANN. I am trying to ascertain from the gentleman who was in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. The fact about it is—I do not trust to my memory about being in the chair at the time myself as Speaker, but the fact is that 128 of the Members, more than enough if all had been voting, voted to seat Lee, but for want of a quorum that vote was nugatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MILLER. Division, Mr. Chairman!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 57.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Tellers, Mr. Chairman!

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 57, noes 62.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be reported back with the recommendation that it lie upon the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LACEY) there were—ayes 61, noes 56.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers, and pending the call for tellers I move that the committee do now rise. [After a pause.] I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that coupled with a request for tellers or not?

Mr. MILLER. No.

Mr. LACEY. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the request for tellers came too late.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. That is what I wanted to inquire.

Mr. MANN. The Chair said the motion was lost and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] made a motion that the committee do rise. He withdrew his demand for tellers.

Mr. LACEY. He withdrew his demand for tellers and I renewed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas called for tellers, and, pending that demand, moved that the committee rise. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] then apparently withdrew his demand for tellers, and thereupon the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] made the demand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Thereupon the gentleman not only withdrew his demand for tellers, but made a motion that the committee do now rise, and after that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] asked for tellers.

Mr. HEFLIN. Another thing, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. In the Committee of the Whole a motion that the committee rise may not be made until a demand for tellers on the pending question has been disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, one word on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When there is a demand for tellers pending, that authority is applicable, but there was at the time the gentleman made the motion that the committee do now rise no demand for tellers pending. He had himself prior to that made a demand, which he had himself withdrawn. And, upon a pointed inquiry from me, so stated to the House. He then renewed his motion that the committee do now rise, and after that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] demanded tellers. Those are the facts.

Mr. LACEY. I think the gentleman is inaccurate in his statement that it was after that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I know it was after it, for this reason: The gentleman arose and said, "I move that the committee do now rise." The Chair will remember the facts. Then I interrupted him, and said, "Is your motion coupled with the demand for tellers?" He responded, "No." I said, "All right, then." Whereupon the gentleman repeated, which was totally unnecessary, "I move that the committee do now rise." Then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] arose and said, "I demand tellers."

Mr. LACEY. The RECORD will show. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the House has been in the Committee of the Whole during the afternoon for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The proper motion, under the circumstances, for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] would have been to move that the committee rise and report. No such motion has been made. The simple motion was made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] that the committee do now rise. And if the gentleman still insists on that motion, the Chair will have to sustain the point of order raised by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. The motion to rise and report has not been made.

Mr. MANN. I understand the motion to rise and report takes precedence of a motion to rise at this stage. I move that the committee rise and report to the House the action of the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has not the right to make that motion. The gentleman in charge of the bills has the right to make the motion.

Mr. LACEY. Is the demand for tellers renewed?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. LACEY. Suppose the committee does not rise, what then is the status of the bill before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Subject to the call for tellers, the Chair will ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] whether or not he insists on the motion that the committee do now rise?

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Then I renew the demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand for tellers is pending.

The question was taken, and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take their places as tellers. The question is on laying the bill aside with a recommendation that it do lie on the table.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the committee rise and report to the House.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the committee can not rise pending a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is well taken; the committee can not rise pending a call for tellers. The tellers will take their places.

The question is on laying the bill aside with a recommendation that it do lie on the table.

The committee divided; and tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 64. [Applause.]

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the committee now rise and report the bills with the several amendments to the House for passage.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we take up the next bill on the Calendar. There is only one more bill there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the next bill on the Calendar be taken up. This will withhold action on the motion that the committee rise and report.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is, Shall the committee rise and report?

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is this a motion to rise or to rise and report?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; on all bills with and without amendments.

Mr. MANN. Of course that does not include this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has not ordered this bill reported.

Mr. MANN. This bill, of course, is not pending now. What we are voting upon are those that have been reported favorably. That bill has never been recommended for favorable report.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill goes back on the Calendar, and will not be reported among the bills acted upon by the committee. The question is on the motion to rise and report the bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration certain bills on the Private Calendar and had directed him to report them back, some with and some without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bills do pass.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be ordered on all the bills and amendments to their final passage.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman proposes to include in the bills for consideration the bill H. R. 6982, I shall object to unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLER. What is that bill?

Mr. MADDEN. It refunds $537.71.

Mr. MILLER. I except that.

Mr. GARNER. They must be all treated alike, and if not, I shall object.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I shall object to the balance. [Laughter.]

HOUSE BILLS WITHOUT AMENDMENTS PASSED.

The following House bills, reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which they were passed laid on the table:

H. R. 12560. A bill for the relief of John C. Lynch;

H. R. 5954. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate gold certificate, in lieu of one lost, to Lincoln National Bank, of Lincoln, Ill.;

H. R. 6. A bill for the relief of the Monongahela Iron and Steel Company, of Pittsburg, Pa.;

H. R. 12028. A bill granting relief to John W. Donovan;

AARON EVERLY.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 7144) for the relief of Aaron Everly, with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, one moment. A parliamentary inquiry: Are the bills that have amendments being taken up in the order in which they passed the committee?

The SPEAKER. This is the first one that has been reported. As is usual, for convenience, the bills without amendment were first reported, and this is the first bill with an amendment.

Mr. GARNER. I asked the question if they were being taken up in the order in which they passed the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that they are not, strictly speaking, and the Chair supposes that, strictly speaking, they ought to be so taken up.

Mr. GARNER. I ask that they be taken up in the order in which they passed the committee.

Mr. MILLER. What difference does it make if we get them all through?

Mr. GARNER. It makes considerable difference in this: If we take up all the bills that have passed the committee, with the exception of the one which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects to, leaving that until the last, it puts me in the attitude of permitting the other bills to be passed and leaving that as the last one. I want to put them all on an equality. This is not my bill, Mr. Chairman, and I will state for the benefit of the chairman of the committee that I did not know the bill was being considered, but I think they all ought to go through on their merits in the same way.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the one that the gentleman objects to will be put last.

Mr. GARNER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the remainder of the bills and call them in the order in which they were considered and reported. Those that have already passed are beyond the control of the Speaker or of the House, except by unanimous consent. The Clerk will proceed as stated by the Chair.

JOHN PURKAPILE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 13735) for the relief of John Purkapile, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask this question again, whether or not the bills are being considered in the order in which they passed the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that all the bills remaining are being considered in the order in which they passed the committee; at least the Chair has instructed the Clerk to take up the remainder of them in that order. These are the amended bills. All the bills that were not amended have been passed.

Mr. GARNER. This bill, as I understand it, was amended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. GARNER. I will ask if the bill H. R. 6982 has been passed?

The SPEAKER. That is the next bill after this one.

Mr. GARNER. I should like to ask if that bill was not the first one that passed the committee this morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the clerks at the desk that it was not. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment, changing the spelling of the name of the beneficiary, was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended to conform to the body of the bill.

STATE RAILROAD COMMISSIONS.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask that there may be printed in the RECORD extracts from the statutes of the different States of the Union bearing upon the right of review in the courts of decisions of the State railroad commissions, and also bearing upon the right of the railroads to defend in the courts against orders made by the commissions. I offer this paper because I think it may contribute something to the information of the Senate and to those members of the Senate who are considering this question. I ask that it be printed as prepared, a certain portion being italicized to bring out the points I have suggested, namely, the right of review and the right of defense against the order of the Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania why not have it also printed as a document for the use of the Senate? The document form is much more convenient.

Mr. KNOX. Very well; I will request that it also be printed as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania requests that the extracts he has sent to the desk be also printed as a document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have the paper read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provisions in the statutes of the several States with regard to review of orders of State railroad commissions, or defense against the enforcement of such orders.

ALABAMA.

SEC. 25. That whenever any person or corporation operating a railroad fails or refuses to comply with any order of the railroad commission, it shall be the duty of said commission, through its president, to certify to the attorney-general the facts of such failure or refusal, together with a certified copy of the order made by said commission in such matter, whereupon it shall be the duty of the attorney-general or some attorney at law to be by him appointed to immediately file in the circuit, chancery, city court, or court of like jurisdiction, appropriate pleadings in the way of a complaint, petition, or bill, as may be in accordance with the rules of pleading and practice in such cases, or cases of similar nature, setting out the name and the style of the case heard before the railroad commission, the relief asked for, and the order of the commission granting such relief, or if such order is made by the commission on its own motion, such statement shall simply set out the order of the commission, the name of the railroad or railroads to which such order was directed, with the averment that said railroad or railroads have refused or failed within the time required by such order to comply therewith, and conclude with the prayer that such railroad or railroads be compelled, by mandamus or injunction, to carry out said order of the railroad commission.

SEC. 26. That upon the trial of said cause the order of the railroad commission shall be prima facie evidence that the thing ordered to be done was correct, reasonable, and just, and the burden of showing that such order is not correct, reasonable, and just, shall be upon the railroad or railroads failing or refusing to comply with the order of said railroad commission.

SEC. 29. That upon the final hearing of said cause either party may appeal within thirty days from the judgment of said court to the supreme court of Alabama. Said railroad commission may take such appeal without filing any bond; but said railroad or railroads shall, before taking such appeal, be required to enter into bond with good and sufficient security in such sum as may be required by the judge of the court trying such case, and which, in the judgment of said judge, may be sufficient to pay the costs of said suit and all damages growing out of said suit to any person by reason of the delay of the enforcement of the order of said railroad commission, and said bond to be approved by said judge of said court. (Act of February 28, 1903; General Acts of 1903, pp. 104–106.)

ARKANSAS.

SEC. 6813. * * * The commission shall institute such action, and actions for the recovery of the penalties prescribed in this act, through the prosecuting attorney of the proper district, and no such suit shall be dismissed or compromised without the consent of the court and of said commissioners; and the prosecuting attorney shall be allowed a fee by the court not to exceed twenty-five per cent of the amount collected; and if any prosecuting attorney shall neglect for fifteen days after notice to bring suit, the commission may employ some other attorney at law to bring the same, who shall be allowed a fee therefor to be fixed by the court, not to exceed twenty-five per cent of the amount collected, and in such case the prosecuting attorney shall not interfere: Provided, That in all trials of cases brought for a violation of any tariff charges by said commission, it may be shown in defense that such tariff so fixed was unjust.

SEC. 6831. If any person or corporation operating a railroad or express company in this State, or any receiver, trustee, or lessee of any such person or corporation as aforesaid, shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or aid or abet therein, or shall violate the tariff of charges as fixed by said commission, or any of the rules regarding railroads or express companies as made by said commission, and for which there is no other penalty prescribed in this act, such person or corporation, or receiver, trustee, or lessee shall be liable to a penalty not less than five hundred nor more than three thousand dollars for each violation of this act, or such tariff of charges or rules and regulations, and such penalty may be recovered by an action to be brought in the name of the State of Arkansas, in the county in which such violation may occur. The commission shall institute such action, and actions for the recovery of the penalties prescribed in this act, through the prosecuting attorney of the proper district, and no such suit shall be dismissed or compromised without the consent of the court and of said commissioners; and the prosecuting attorney shall be allowed a fee by the court not to exceed twenty-five per cent of the amount collected, and if any prosecuting attorney shall neglect for fifteen days after notice to bring suit, the commission may employ some other attorney at law to bring the same, who shall be allowed a fee therefor to be fixed by the court, not to exceed twenty-five per cent of the amount collected, and in such case the prosecuting attorney shall not interfere: Provided, That in all trials of cases brought for a violation of any tariff charges by said commission it may be shown in defense that such tariff so fixed was unjust. (Digest of Statutes of Arkansas, 1904.)

FLORIDA.

SEC. 22. The said railroad commissioners are hereby vested with judicial powers to do or enforce or perform any function, duty, or power conferred upon them by this act to the exercise of which judicial power is necessary.

SEC. 23. Appeals by either party shall be from judgments, orders, and decrees of inferior courts in all suits and cases brought under the provisions of this act to the same extent that appeals lie in similar suits and cases brought under any other law in this State, and not otherwise. (Act of June 3, 1899; Laws of Florida, 1889, p. 92.)

INDIANA.

SEC. 6. If any railroad company or other corporation or party in interest shall be dissatisfied with any rate, classification, rule, charge, or general regulation made, approved, adopted, or ordered by the commission, such dissatisfied company or party may, within sixty days after any such action has been taken by the commission, procure from the secretary of the commission, whose duty it shall be to furnish the same, a complete transcript of all the proceedings of the commission relative thereto, and if he or it so desires, a copy of all the evidence heard or considered by the commission at the hearing at which such action or decision was made, which evidence shall be incorporated into such transcript, and such dissatisfied company or party may file said tranvcript, with a concise written statement of its or his causes of complaint against the action of the commission, in the office of the clerk of the appellate court of Indiana within thirty days after procuring the same, and not later than ninety days after the action of the commission complained of has been spread upon its records. Said complaining company or party shall, at the time of filing such transcript, give or cause to be given to said commission written notice thereof, and shall, within five days thereafter, file proof of such notice in the office of said clerk of the appellate court, who shall, ten days thereafter, or upon the appearance of said commission to said appeal, place said cause upon the docket of the said appellate court for hearing and determination. The commission shall be made a party to such proceeding in the appellate court, and shall defend the same.

Issues shall be formed and the controversy tried and determined as in other civil cases of an equitable nature; and said court may set aside, vacate, or annul one or more or any part of any of the regulations, orders, findings, or decisions adopted by the said board which shall be found to be unreasonable, unjust, oppressive, or unlawful without disturbing others. Either party to said cause, if dissatisfied with the judgment or decree of said court, may institute proceedings in error in the supreme court as in other civil cases, and said court shall examine the record, including the evidence, and render such judgment as shall be just and proper in the premises. (General Statutes of Kansas (Dassler), 1901.)

SEC. 9. * * * In case any railway company shall charge and receive any rate for the transportation of freight in excess of the rate authorized by the board of railroad commissioners, and if the rate authorized by the board of railroad commissioners shall be reasonable and just, then said railroad company shall repay the amount so charged or received in excess of the rate fixed by the board of railroad commissioners on demand therefor; and in case of failure to repay any such amount within thirty days after such demand the amount thereof may be recovered, together with reasonable attorney fees, in an action brought for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That if such railroad company shall within thirty days after such decision or determination by said board bring suit to test the reasonableness of such rates, no suit shall be brought for said excess until said rates have been adjudicated. G. F. TARBELL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7961) for the relief of G. F. Tarbell; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill, a precisely similar bill having been reported from the Committee on Finance of the Senate and being now on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts for the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay $2,540.73 to G. F. Tarbell, of Boston, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, that sum having been exacted as duties and paid to the collector of customs at the port of Boston by G. F. Tarbell, on the 3d of December, 1902, covering a consignment of 144 head of cattle shipped from Canada in bond via Boston, Mass., to Liverpool, England, on the 25th of November, 1902, and being prohibited from being so shipped by general orders from the Department of Agriculture, dated the 27th of November, 1902, the cattle being then slaughtered and exported on the Cestrian on the 10th of December, 1902.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the bill (S. 2742) for the relief of J. F. Tarbell, being 1389 on the Calendar and identical with the bill from the House of Representatives just passed, may be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made in the absence of objection.

JOHN HUDGINS.

Mr. WARNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to announce at this time that on Thursday morning next, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall submit some remarks on the statehood bill.

FIRE ESCAPES ON BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 122) to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 5, after the word "height," to strike out "over thirty feet in height."

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move, before the word "over," in line 5 of the same section, to insert the word "or;" so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the owner, lessee, occupant, or person having possession, charge, or control of any building three or more stories in height, or over 30 feet in height, constructed or used, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire what are the provisions of the bill with respect to how many fire escapes there are to be, and how that matter is to be regulated?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is left to the discretion of the Commissioners.

Mr. MALLORY. The Commissioners are to prescribe the number?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; they are to prescribe the number.

Mr. MALLORY. What are the provisions of the bill as to the character of buildings required to be provided with fire escapes after its passage; in other words, what buildings fall within the category of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. All buildings three stories in height or over 30 feet in height, other than private residences.

Mr. MALLORY. Buildings now in existence?

Mr. GALLINGER. Now in existence or hereafter to be constructed.

Mr. KEAN. Does it apply to Government buildings?

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 2, line 8, after the words "second story," to strike out "where there are not provided at least two stairways, each 3 or more feet wide and separated from each other by a distance of at least 30 feet;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the owner, lessee, occupant, or person having possession, charge, or control of any building already erected, or which may hereafter be erected, in which ten or more persons are employed at the same time in any of the stories above the second story, to provide and cause to be erected and affixed thereto a sufficient number of the aforesaid fire escapes, the location and number of the same to be determined by the said Commissioners, and to keep the nallways and stairways in every such building as is used and occupied at night properly lighted, to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, from sunset to sunrise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 9, line 14, after the words "a further fine of," to strike out "fifty" and insert "five;" so as to read:

SEC. 9. That any person failing or neglecting to provide fire escapes, alarm gongs, guide signs, fire hose, fire extinguishers, or other appliances required by this act, after notice from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia so to do, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100, and shall be punished by a further fine of $5 for each day that he fails to comply with the notice aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 10, line 25, after the word "notice," to insert, "unless the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, in their discretion, deem it necessary to extend the time;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That the said notice requiring the erection of fire escapes and other appliances mentioned in this act shall specify the character and number of fire escapes or other appliances to be provided, the location of the same, and the time within which said fire escapes or other appliances shall be provided, and in no case shall more than ninety days be allowed for compliance with said notice unless the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, in their discretion, deem it necessary to extend the time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WATERWORKS AT LAWTON, OKLA.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13674) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, and so forth, approved March 3, 1901,' approved June 30, 1902."

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, February 14, 1906.

Mr. LODGE. I ask if we can not avoid the reading of this long report by a statement from the Senator in charge as to the provisions of the bill. The bill apparently had no opposition in the House and has none here. It does not take money out of the Treasury.

Mr. KEAN. It is only an explanation of the bill that I wish to have.

Mr. LODGE. It is a long report, and it will take a good deal of time to read it. I do not see why it should be read if we can have a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I am entirely satisfied with that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is to permit the use of $60,000 out of a fund derived from the sale of town lots in the city of Lawton, Okla., for the construction and maintenance of a waterworks system in that city. This fund amounted to about one-half million dollars, which sum was to be used in the construction of roads, bridges, and a court-house. Provision was made for the appropriation of a certain amount for waterworks purposes. That amount was entirely inadequate to supply a system for a town the size of Lawton, and the purpose of this bill is to increase the amount by appropriating $60,000 in addition to the amount already appropriated.

There is now $126,000 in the fund, and this bill proposes to take $60,000 of that fund and have it added to the former appropriation. It takes no money out of the Treasury of the United States.

I hope this explanation will prove satisfactory to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. "The Senator from New Jersey" has no objection whatever to the bill, but he thinks it is just as well, when people are trying to get some money, to have some explanation why it should be done.

Mr. LONG. I am pleased to know that my explanation is satisfactory to the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey withdraw his request for the reading of the report?

Mr. KEAN. I do.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENTS UNDER THE MOSES AGREEMENT.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10697) providing for the issuance of patents for lands allotted to Indians under the Moses agreement of July 7, 1883.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HIGHWAY NEAR FORT SHERMAN, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3414) providing for a public highway on the east side of the Fort Sherman abandoned military reservation, Idaho.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to grant to the county of Kootenai, Idaho, for a public highway, a strip of land lying on the east side of the abandoned Fort Sherman military reservation, in Idaho, designated by the official plat of survey as lots 1, 2, and 3 of section 12, and lots 1, 2, and 3 of section 13, township 50 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That if the said county of Kootenai shall, at any time hereafter, abandon the lands above described and cease to use the same for said purposes, said above-described lands shall revert to the Government of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT QUINCY, MASS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Calendar the bill (S. 684) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, Mass.

There being an objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 9, after the words "sum of," to strike out "one hundred and seventy" and insert "eighty-five;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected upon the site already selected and purchased by him in the city of Quincy, Mass., a building to be used as and for a post-office building and for other purposes of the Federal Government, at the said city of Quincy, Mass., which said building shall cost, complete, not to exceed the sum of $85,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

DELIA B. STUART.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2724) for the relief of Delia B. Stuart, widow of John Stuart.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Delia B. Stuart, widow of John Stuart, late a private of Company H, Second United States Artillery, the sum of $150, this sum being due her as the widow of John Stuart as a balance of bounty still unpaid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREAT COUNCIL OF ORDER OF RED MEN.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3292) to incorporate the Great Council of the United States of the Improved Order of Red Men.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 14, after the word "politic," to insert the words "and corporate in the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

And all other persons who are now members, or shall hereafter be admitted as such, agreeable to the constitution and laws of the said Great Council, be, and they are hereby, incorporated and made a body politic and corporate in the District of Columbia, by the name of the "Great Council of the United States of the Improved Order of Red Men," and by that name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in any court of law or equity, and may have and use a common seal, and change the seal at pleasure, and be entitled hereunder to use and exercise all the powers, rights, and privileges incidental to fraternal and benevolent corporations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Provided, That such constitution and amendments do not conflict with the laws of the United States or of any State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2446) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Devils Lake, in the State of North Dakota.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other governmental offices in the city of Devils Lake and State of North Dakota, the cost of the site and building, including vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed $150,000.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, after line 18, to strike out the following:

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after such examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to have considered at the present time the bill (S. 3288) to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Pennsylvania and Newark Railroad Company, or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over for a few minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over for the present.

Mr. SPOONER subsequently said: I objected to House bill 13542 in order that I might read the report. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

FIRE PUMPS ON STEAMERS.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have several little bills passed, one after the other. They are not private bills; they are all public bills.

I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4298) to amend section 4471 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulation of steam vessels.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 4471 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by striking out, after the words "is afloat" and before the words "Every steamer," the words "and no fire pump thus provided for shall be placed below the lower deck of the vessel;" so that the section when amended shall read as follows:

SEC. 4471. Every steamer permitted by her certificate of inspection to carry as many as fifty passengers or upward, and every steamer carrying passengers which also carries cotton, hay, or hemp shall be provided with a good double-acting steam fire pump or other equivalent apparatus for throwing water. Such pump or other apparatus for throwing water shall be kept at all times and at all seasons of the year in good order and ready for immediate use, having at least two pipes of suitable dimensions, one on each side of the vessel, to convey the water to the upper decks, to which pipes there shall be attached, by means of stop cocks or valves, both between decks and on the upper deck, good and suitable hose of sufficient strength to stand a pressure of not less than 100 pounds to the square inch, long enough to reach to all parts of the vessel and properly provided with nozzles, and kept in good order and ready for immediate service. Every steamer exceeding 200 tons burden and carrying passengers shall be provided with two good double-acting fire pumps, to be worked by hand; each chamber of such pumps, except pumps upon steamers in service on the 28th day of February, 1871, shall be of sufficient capacity to contain not less than 100 cubic inches of water; and such pumps shall be placed in the most suitable parts of the vessel for efficient service, having suitable well-fitted hose to each pump, of at least one-half the vessel in length, kept at all times in perfect order, and shipped up and ready for immediate use. On every steamer not exceeding 200 tons one of such pumps may be dispensed with. Each fire pump thus prescribed shall be supplied with water by means of a suitable pipe connected therewith, and passing through the side of the vessel so low as to be at all times under water when she is afloat. Every steamer shall also be provided with a pump which shall be of sufficient strength and suitably arranged to test the boilers thereof.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if these bills, either of them, relate to the manning of ships?

Mr. FRYE. No; not at all. They have nothing to do with the manning of ships. This bill simply changes the pump on the lower deck to make it accessible to the engineer under recent plans of construction.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to inquire of the Senator what bill is under consideration.

Mr. FRYE. It is not the one in which the Senator is interested. That has not been called up.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INSPECTION OF STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. FRYE. There is on the Calendar the bill (S. 4300) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels; but I will not call up that bill. That is the bill the Senator from Ohio is interested in. I will call up the bill (S. 4299) to amend section 4421 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspection of steam vessels.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. House bill 12707, the "statehood bill," so called.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for a few moments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The bill called up by the Senator from Maine will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4421 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Upon such inspection and approval the inspectors shall also make and subscribe a temporary certificate, which shall set forth substantially the fact of such inspection and approval, and shall deliver the same to the master or owner of the vessel, and shall keep a copy thereof on file in their office. The said temporary certificate shall be carried and exposed by vessels in the same manner as is provided in section 4423 for copies of the regular certificate, and the form thereof and the period during which it is to be in force shall be as prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors, or the executive committee thereof, as provided in section 4405. And such temporary certificate, during such period and prior to the delivery to the master or owner of the copies of the regular certificate, shall take the place of, and be a substitute for, such copies of the regular certificate of inspection, as required by sections 4423, 4424, and 4426, and for the purposes of said sections, and shall also, during such period, be a substitute for the regular certificate of inspection as required by section 4498 and for the purposes of said section until such regular certificate of inspection has been filed with the collector or other chief officer of customs. Such temporary certificate shall also be subject to revocation in the manner and under the conditions provided in section 4453. No vessel required to be inspected under the provisions of this title shall be navigated without having on board an unexpired regular certificate of inspection or such temporary certificate," so that said section, when amended as above, shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4421. When the inspection of a steam vessel is completed and the inspectors approve the vessel and her equipment throughout, they shall make and subscribe a certificate to the collector or other chief officer of the customs of the district in which such inspection has been made, in accordance with the form and regulations prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors. Such certificate shall be verified by the oaths of inspectors signing it, before the chief officer of the customs of the district, or any other person competent by law to administer oaths. If the inspectors refuse to grant a certificate of approval, they shall make a statement in writing, and sign the same, giving the reasons for their disapproval. Upon such inspection and approval, the inspectors shall also make and subscribe a temporary certificate, which shall set forth substantially the fact of such inspection and approval, and shall deliver the same to the master or owner of the vessel, and shall keep a copy thereof on file in their office. The said temporary certificate shall be carried and exposed by vessels in the same manner as is provided in section 4423 for copies of the regular certificate, and the form thereof and the period during which it is to be in force shall be as prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors, or the executive committee thereof, as provided in section 4405. And such temporary certificate, during such period and prior to the delivery to the master or owner of the copies of the regular certificate, shall take the place of, and be a substitute for, such copies of the regular certificate of inspection as required by sections 4423, 4424, and 4426, and for the purposes of said sections, and shall also, during such period, be a substitute for the regular certificate of inspection as required by section 4498 and for the purposes of said section until such regular certificate of inspection has been filed with the collector or other chief officer of customs. Such temporary certificate shall also be subject to revocation in the manner and under the conditions provided in section 4453. No vessel required to be inspected under the provisions of this title shall be navigated without having on board an unexpired regular certificate of inspection or such temporary certificate."

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The amendment should be amended by inserting after the word "objects," in the third line of the proposed amendment, the words "notwithstanding the fact that both said corporations may have common trustees." I move that amendment to the amendment.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 9. That such corporation hereby incorporated upon accepting a transfer of all the real and personal property of such other corporation shall succeed to the obligations and liabilities and be held liable to pay and discharge all the debts, liabilities, and contracts of such corporation so existing to the same effect as if such corporation hereby incorporated had itself incurred the obligation or liability to pay such debt or damages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FULTON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2286) to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit to determine in equity the rights of American citizens under the award of the Bering Sea arbitration of Paris and to render judgment thereon.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to confer jurisdiction in equity upon the circuit court of the United States for the ninth circuit to examine and determine the rights of American citizens under the award of the Paris arbitration concerning the jurisdiction of Bering Sea.

Section 2 provides that all American citizens whose rights were affected by the award may submit to the court their claims thereunder, and the court shall enter judgment thereon. Claims not submitted within two years from the passage of the act shall thereafter be forever barred.

I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, so as to give an opportunity to examine the bill and compare it with the bill which was so much debated at the last session. If I find that it seems to be without objection, I shall ask leave to withdraw the motion; otherwise I shall press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). The motion to reconsider will be entered.

SEC. 2. That no part of the value of this material shall be paid to the State of Connecticut, but the whole amount received from the sale thereof to the State shall stand as a credit to the quota of the State, the same as though allotted from the annual appropriations under the provisions of section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, and subject to all the conditions thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

REGULATION OF MOTOR BOATS.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4094) to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—regulation of motor boats.

The being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes, so as to make it read as follows:

SEC. 4426. The hull and boilers of every ferryboat, canal boat, yacht, or other small craft of like character propelled by steam shall be inspected under the provisions of this title. Such other provisions of law for the better security of life as may be applicable to such vessels shall, by the regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, also be required to be complied with before a certificate of inspection shall be granted, and no such vessel shall be navigated without a licensed engineer and a licensed pilot: Provided, however, That in open steam launches of 10 gross tons and under one person, if duly qualified, may serve in the double capacity of pilot and engineer. All vessels of above 15 gross tons carrying freight or passengers for hire, propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors, shall be, and are hereby, made subject to all the provisions of section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the inspection of hulls and boilers and requiring engineers and pilots, and for any violation of the provisions of this title applicable to such vessels, or of rules or regulations lawfully established thereunder, and to the extent to which such provisions of law and regulations are so applicable, the said vessels, their masters, officers, and owners shall be subject to the provisions of sections 4496, 4497, 4498, 4499, and 4500, relating to the imposition and enforcement of penalties and the enforcement of law.

All vessels of 15 gross tons or less propelled in whole or in part by gas, gasoline, petroleum, naphtha, fluid, or electricity, and carrying passengers for hire, shall carry one life preserver, of the sort prescribed by the regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, for every passenger carried, and no such boat while so carrying passengers shall be operated or navigated except in charge of a person duly licensed for such service by the local board of inspectors. No examination shall be required as a condition of the obtaining of such a license, and any such license shall be revoked or suspended by the local board of inspectors for misconduct, gross negligence, recklessness in navigation, intemperance, or violation of law on the part of the holder, and if revoked, the person holding such license shall be incapable of obtaining another such license for one year from the date of revocation.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to have the last paragraph of the clause beginning on page 3, line 19, again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

No examination shall be required as a condition of the obtaining of such a license, and any such license shall be revoked or suspended by the local board of inspectors for misconduct, gross negligence, recklessness in navigation, intemperance, or violation of law on the part of the holder, and if revoked, the person holding such license shall be incapable of obtaining another such license for one year from the date of revocation.

Mr. FRYE. That is the mildest possible form of protection. The driver of the boat is to receive a license without examination, so that if he becomes drunken or negligent or violates the law the local inspector may simply revoke his license for one year.

Mr. MALLORY. I could not hear the suggested amendment of the section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. FRYE. It is the mildest possible protection.

Mr. MALLORY. There is no requirement that the individual running the boat shall be subject to any special examination?

Mr. FRYE. He would be subject to no examination at all. He would receive his license on application. The license having been given, it is in the power of the local inspector to take it away if the holder violates the law. That is all there is to it, practically.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question, simply for information. I do not wish to interfere with this bill, but it seems to me it would be very much safer for the public to have some guaranty through examination that the person having charge of such a boat is fit to take charge of it, to navigate it, and to handle the machinery, than to provide that his license shall be taken away for one year after his incapacity shall have been shown at the cost of life.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not catch the remark of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not addressing myself particularly to the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], but rather to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. There have been some explosions attributed to the incapacity of the men having charge of motor boats. Does not the Senator from Maine think that there should be some effort made to ascertain their capacity before the persons having charge of these boats become the custodians of passengers?

Mr. FRYE. This bill only applies to motor boats of 15 tons. The bill which I originally introduced was a little more drastic than this, but I referred it to the Department of Commerce and Labor, and, instead of accepting my bill, they drafted the bill which is now before the Senate, saying that, in their opinion, it would serve all the required purposes and would not subject so many of these little craft to the regular steamboat inspectors for examination and license. The Department considered the provision empowering the local inspectors to take away the license would be ample to insure reasonable protection.

Mr. SPOONER. But there is no protection at all to the people on these boats in case of those having them in charge being unfit to manage them. Should we not have some means of first ascertaining whether they are qualified to handle a boat before we permit them to attempt it? As to the people who are carried, should they lose their lives it would be no comfort to them or to those who have lost them to have the license taken away. It seems to me, at least, that as to fitness, a part of which would be temperance, there ought to be some safeguard in advance to protect the people.

Mr. FRYE. But the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, in his report, said he believed that the very fact that there was a license, that the man was liable to lose the license, and that he could not have it renewed for a year at any rate, would make him careful.

Mr. SPOONER. But under that system the only man who takes any chances is the man who gets the license, and the only chance he takes is the possible loss of it if he is not fit or if he gets drunk. How does that in any way help the public? I would rather have the opinion of the Senator from Maine on such a subject than that of the Department of Commerce and Labor. If he thinks this bill is all right; if he thinks it would be regarded as adequate protection for a member of his own family; if he thinks that there should be no preliminary examination of these people as to fitness to handle such machinery, I defer to his superior judgment and his experience; but it seems to me it would be trifling with the subject if there is any occasion for examination or care at all.

Mr. FRYE. I am content at this time with this step toward protection. There are thousands of these boats, not all carrying passengers for hire. This bill only applies to those which carry passengers for fare.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that.

Mr. FRYE. And the remonstrances that have come into Congress and to every Senator here from the owners of these little boats would probably prevent the passage of any sort of protective legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but it would be better for men who are fit and who can pass an examination. It is the people who do not want to be examined who make these remonstrances.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, no.

Mr. SPOONER. I know of no one else who would do so.

Mr. MALLORY. Has the Senator from Wisconsin ever heard any complaint of loss of life because of the incompetency of those who operate these launches?

Mr. SPOONER. I think I have.

Mr. MALLORY. I have seen a great many of them. This bill only applies to launches under 15 tons.

Mr. SPOONER. Can anyone handle them?

Mr. MALLORY. I think any intelligent man can learn to handle one in two days.

Mr. SPOONER. If we give him a license——

Mr. MALLORY. Give him a license and keep him under restraint. The point there, as shown by this bill, is, if he misbehaves or gets drunk or is guilty of any conduct that is reprehensible, he can have his license taken away from him.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not find out before he gets his license whether or not he is in the habit of getting drunk and whether he is fit in other respects?

Mr. MALLORY. It is very probable that they are examined. We have a right to examine them.

Mr. FRYE. I am willing to risk it for the present, at any rate.

Mr. SPOONER. I know how that is on ships. You think everything is all right when the laws provide for boats, a fire protection, ladders, and buckets, and all that kind of thing; but the moment some movement is inaugurated to require a proper crew of capable men, men who from experience would be expected to be cool and to know precisely what to do in the time of disaster, you get protests from every shipowner in the United States. Of course, this principle begins down at this little owner of a little motor craft.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, it strikes me that this bill, as a first step, goes amply far for the purpose intended. If hereafter it should appear that there is no necessity for us to adopt any more drastic and stringent measure to prevent incompetent men from taking charge of these naphtha launches, we can do it very well; but for my part, and I think I have seen a good many of these launches, I have never seen any reason for us to do more than to say that sober men and fairly intelligent men shall have charge of such launches.

In the larger ports they do the duty of something similar to hacks around the town, they transport the masters and passengers from large vessels to landings; and they are generally owned by men of moderate means. It is unnecessary to subject them to additional expense if they can get along without doing any injury to the public. I have never heard of any one of these launches being the cause of loss of life to anybody. Launches owned by individuals occasionally explode, which has happened I know in several cases, but as to these launches that are run for the public, for passengers, I never heard of a single instance of any injury to a passenger, I think.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will allow us to try this.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill if it affects motor boats that are not run for hire?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it affects only those running for hire—carrying passengers for hire.

Mr. CULBERSON. Not mere pleasure boats and boats for personal convenience?

Mr. FRYE. Not at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDAD C. MARTIN.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14344) for the relief of Col. Medad C. Martin. It is identically the same as the Calendar No. 1392, being Senate bill 1483, which, if I can secure the passage of the House bill, I shall ask to have indefinitely postponed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow a credit in the accounts of Lieut. Col. Medad C. Martin, Deputy Quartermaster-General, United States Army, for the sum of $708.65, which sum was stolen, through no fault of the officer, January 8, 1905, while in transit from Manila, P. I., to Lipa, Batangas, P. I.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. I now move that the bill (S. 1483) for the relief of Col. Medad C. Martin, being Order of Business 1392, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF EUCLID STREET.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2623) for the extension of Euclid street, in Meridian Hill, District of Columbia.

The first amendment was, in section 1, on page 1, line 3, after the word "within," to strike out "twenty" and insert "sixty;" in the same line, after the word "the," to strike out "dedication to the District of Columbia of at least two-thirds of the land necessary for the extension of Rittenhouse street as hereinafter described" and insert "passage of this act;" in line 11, after the word "of," to strike out "Rittenhouse" and insert "Euclid;" in line 12, after the word "street," to insert "in a straight line;" in the same line, after the word "of," to strike out "ninety" and insert "fifty;" and on page 2, line 1, after the word "from," to strike out "Broad Branch road westward to the District line, said street being shown on the permanent system of highway plans about 700 feet north of a line passing east and west through the center of Chevy Chase circle" and insert "Champlain street to Columbia road;" so as to make the section read:

That within sixty days after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by petition particularly describing the lands to be taken, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Euclid street, in a straight line with a width of 50 feet, from Champlain street to Columbia road.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, on page 2, line 9, after the word "of," to strike out "Rittenhouse" and insert "Euclid;" and in line 22, after the word "for," to strike out:

Provided, That the remaining portion of any parcel of land of any party dedicating shall be exempt from any assessment in respect to the cost of condemning any portion of said street that may not be dedicated or from any assessment for benefits of the extension of Rittenhouse street.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the entire amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the extension of Euclid street as herein provided shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said street as extended, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the extension of said street as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited, and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of lands the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the extension of said street as aforesaid, and the verdict of said jury shall also be for a sufficient sum to cover all the costs of the condemnation proceedings herein provided for.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 6, line 3, after the word "land," to strike out "by the Treasurer of the United States, ex-officio commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, upon the warrant of the Commissioners of said District, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," and insert "by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury upon requisitions of the Commissioners of said District, as provided by law; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That when the verdict of said jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded and adjudged to be payable for lands taken under the provisions hereof shall be paid to the owners of said land by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury upon requisitions of the Commissioners of said District, as provided by law; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 6, line 21, after the words "rate of," to strike out "ten" and insert "four;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That when confirmed by the court, the several assessments herein provided to be made shall severally be a lien upon the land assessed, and shall be collected as special improvement taxes in the District of Columbia, and shall be payable in two equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from and after sixty days after the confirmation of the verdict and award. In all cases of payments the accounting officers shall take into account the assessment for benefits and the award for damages, and shall pay only such part of said award in respect of any lot as may be in excess of the assessment for benefits against the part of such lot not taken, and there shall be credited on said assessment the amount of said award not in excess of said assessment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMORIAL OF THE LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4370) to appropriate the sum of $40,000 to the Cape Cod Pilgrim's Memorial Association, to be used in erecting at Provincetown, Mass., a suitable memorial of the landing of the Pilgrims.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to appropriate the sum of $40,000 as a part contribution toward the erection of a monument at Provincetown, Mass., in commemoration of the landing of the Pilgrims and the signing of the Mayflower compact."

YELLOWSTONE FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 13673) to extend the provisions of the homestead laws to certain lands in the Yellowstone Forest Reserve.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CESSION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at the present time of the bill (S. 4313) ceding to the State of California certain vacant unappropriated public lands in Santa Cruz County, State of California.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, on page 2, line 7, after the words "the premises to be," to insert "under the control and to be;" and in line 8, after the words "managed by the," to strike out "California Redwood Park Commissioners, who shall receive no compensation for their services" and insert "proper authorities of the State of California;" so as to read:

The premises to be under the control and to be managed by the proper authorities of the State of California.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator from California ought to make a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, the bill provides for the ceding to the State of California of certain lands in the county of Santa Cruz, Cal., adjoining and adjacent to what is known as the "California Big Trees," which have been purchased by the State of California, the amount expended being $250,000. It is the desire of the people of the State of California that there should be a pleasure ground there, and this land is necessary for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESTORATION TO PUBLIC DOMAIN OF CERTAIN MINNESOTA LANDS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2296) restoring to the public domain certain lands in the State of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, which were, in line 3, page 2, to strike out "repeal" and insert "appeal;" and to strike out lines 12 and 13, as follows: "be indorsed on homesteads allowed for these lands the following: 'Subject to the right of the United States to overflow,'" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "be incorporated in the final receipts and in the patents when issued for these lands a condition and reservation reading as follows: 'Subject to the right of the United States to overflow;'" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands, to wit: The southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 2, township 134 north of range 29 west, fifth principal meridian, and the east half of the northeast quarter and lots 5 and 6 of section 10, township 134 north of range 29 west, fifth principal meridian, being situate in the State of Minnesota, are hereby restored to the public domain, subject to homestead entry; and all rights of priority of entry and settlement are hereby reserved, to be determined as to respective claims by the proper officials of the land office of the district in which said lands are situate, subject to appeal and review as provided by law for the entry of lands for homesteads: Provided, however, That said homestead entries shall be made subject to, and the restoration of these lands to the public domain is made subject to, the right of the United States to construct and maintain dams for the purpose of creating reservoirs in the aid of navigation; and no claim shall accrue by reason of the overflow of said lands on account of the construction and maintenance of such dams and reservoirs. And there shall be incorporated in the final receipts and in the patents when issued for these lands a condition and reservation reading as follows: "Subject to the right of the United States to overflow."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CERTAIN LANDS IN IDAHO.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am directed by the Committee on Irrigation, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4862) allowing settlers with permanent improvements on the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, in Idaho, to buy lots on which said improvements are located, at an appraised price for cash, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, in Idaho, created and surveyed by the Government, on which town site settlers have been allowed to establish themselves and had actually established themselves prior to the approval of this act, in permanent buildings and with substantial improvements, not easily moved, the said settlers shall be given the right to purchase the lots occupied by them at an appraised valuation for cash, such appraisement to be made under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Reclamation funds may be used to defray the necessary expenses of appraisement and sale, and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the reclamation fund.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THIRD INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN STATES.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is generally understood that up to 3 o'clock the unanimous-consent arrangement will continue, and as it is hardly that time, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4773) for the payment of the expenses of the delegates to the Third International Conference of American States. I think it will lead to no discussion. It is only three or four lines long.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $100,000 for the actual and necessary expenses of delegates of the United States to the Third International Conference of American States, to be held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, beginning July 21, 1906, and of their salaried clerical assistants, to be immediately available and disbursed under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. NELSON (at 3 o'clock p. m.). I now call up the statehood bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks for the reading of the bill. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the bill.

THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. NELSON. The bill (S. 3044) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service was, at the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the other day transferred to the Calendar under Rule IX. I ask that it may be transferred back to the Calendar under Rule VIII. I understand that the Senator from Maine has no objection.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] objected to the bill and had it placed on the Calendar under Rule IX. He has since examined carefully the bill and tells me it is an important one for the revenue service, not expensive at all, that his objection is withdrawn, and he has no question now but that it ought to be restored to the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 3044) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service be transferred from Rule IX to Rule VIII on the Calendar. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is granted.

Mr. FRYE. Now, if there is no objection, I should like to have the bill considered. It is an important one for the Service.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the statehood bill be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be taken up for action.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 5, before the word "years," to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "twenty-four;" so as to read:

Provided, That a person to be eligible for appointment as a cadet of the line shall produce satisfactory evidence of good moral character, shall be not less than 18 nor more than 24 years of age at the time of appointment, and shall pass a satisfactory physical examination by a board of officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and a satisfactory educational examination, which must in all cases be written and strictly competitive, by a board of commissioned officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, both examinations to be conducted under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1243) providing for compulsory education in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect on July 1, 1906.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he thinks the schools will be in session on the 1st of July, and whether there are sufficient school facilities now provided to enable all the children who would come under these compulsory provisions to attend the schools?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as to the first question the Senator asks, as to whether the schools will be in session on the 1st day of July, I should judge that they would not be. So the act will be operative upon the beginning of the next school term. That, of course, will do no harm. Perhaps it is all the better, for the reason that some school buildings will be in process of construction during that interval, and better provision will consequently be made.

I have, Mr. President, hesitated about urging the enactment of this law, for the reason that it has come to my knowledge from time to time that we do not have adequate school facilities even for the accommodation of the scholars who are now enrolled, giving them all a full day's schooling. But the Commissioners of the District, who have this matter in their immediate charge, seem to think that by the time the bill becomes operative there will be facilities for educating all the children, especially as many of them will go into parochial schools and other private schools.

In addition to that, a great many very good people are urging that it is infinitely better to give a child a half day's school than none at all, and that we should follow the example almost every State in the Union has set us of having a compulsory education law, and then letting the board of education and the Commissioners do the best for the children that they can under the existing conditions.

I shall hope that when the District of Columbia appropriation bill is under consideration this year very liberal provision will be made for new school buildings, if they are required, and I really think they are. I know that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who has most to do with that appropriation bill, will be glad to cooperate to bring about that very important result.

We ought not to be behind other communities as we are to-day in the matter of providing for the children of this District. We ought to have facilities to educate them all and we ought to have a law that will compel them to attend school during certain years, either a half day or a whole day, as the circumstances might seem to demand.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator what the age limit is?

Mr. GALLINGER. Between the ages of 8 and 14.

The report of the committee upon the bill is illuminating in the matters the Senator from Iowa has called to my attention, and I am going to ask that the report shall be printed in the RECORD in connection with the consideration of the bill, if the bill shall be passed, as I trust it will be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD in connection with the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1243) providing for compulsory education in the District of Columbia, have considered the same and report thereon with recommendation that it pass as amended.

The bill is intended to provide a simple and effective compulsory education law in the District of Columbia to replace the present law, which is inadequate and obsolete. The District is one of the few jurisdictions in the United States having no effective law of this character, the need of which is forcibly suggested by the fact that from 4,000 to 6,000 children of the District of school age do not attend a school of any kind. A committee of citizens interested in the subject have recently investigated this matter and have issued a statement to the effect that more than 6,000 children in the District from 7 to 15 years of age do not attend school, these figures being based upon the Federal census and the records of school enrollments. As will be seen in the letter which follows, the superintendent of schools estimates this number at less than 5,000. There seems to be no method of determining the exact number of children not enrolled without instituting a school census, but notwithstanding the absence of information which is absolutely accurate, it is certain that the conditions are such as to make it highly desirable that legislation be adopted to correct the evil.

There has been some doubt as to the practicability of such a law at this time owing to the already crowded conditions of the present school buildings and the fact that it has been necessary to limit many schools of the lower grades to half-day sessions.

With this objection in mind, the committee caused to be addressed to the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia a letter asking for information upon this point. Commissioner Macfarland's reply to this letter is given herewith:

FEBRUARY 9, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR DILLINGHAM: In response to your recent inquiry I have to say that it is stated by the superintendent of schools that the present school buildings could take care of a considerable number of those who would be brought into the public schools by a compulsory-education law after the 1st of July next. The effect of the law would be naturally cumulative and gradually all could be taken in who would come under its operation, provided the building of new schools is steadily carried on as rapidly as possible, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The superintendent of schools estimates that there are less than 5,000 children of school age who are now not enrolled in the schools of the District of Columbia. A considerable number would be provided for under a compulsory-education law in the private or parochial schools. Last year the total enrollment in the public schools of the District of Columbia was 51,230; no child applying was turned away, and the average percentage of attendance was 93.5. The superintendent states that there are only 186 habitual truants, and that it is comparatively easy for the teachers to keep track of them. It is true that there are a number of half-day schools (in all now 391), but they are all for the first three grades, which is strictly primary work for children under 10 years of age, and a great majority of them are for children of the first and second grades, or children under 9 years of age. There are only 42 half-day schools above the second grade, made up of third-grade scholars.

Sincerely yours, HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND.

Hon. W. P. DILLINGHAM,
United States Senate.

From the above letter it appears that by the beginning of the next school year there will be room in the school buildings of the District to accommodate all pupils who might be enrolled as the result of a compulsory-education law, and in view of this the committee suggests that the bill be amended by the addition of another section, as follows:

"SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect on July 1, 1906."

The bill presented was drawn after a careful study of several State laws on the subject, and is framed especially to meet the needs of the District of Columbia. It is singularly free from multitudinous details and drastic provisions, which would render its enforcement difficult and expensive and its operation a needless hardship to parents or children. In the latter regard special attention is directed to the last clause of section 1 of the bill, which provides that—

"A child may be excused from school attendance or instruction upon presentation of satisfactory evidence that he has already been instructed in the branches taught in the public schools, or that he has already acquired these branches of learning, or that his physical or mental condition is such as to render such attendance or instruction for the whole period required, or any part thereof, inexpedient or impracticable."

Attention is also directed to section 8 of the bill, which provides "that if any parent or guardian shall be unable, by reason of poverty, to send the child under his control to school as provided for in this act it shall be the duty of the board of education to take such action as in its discretion may best promote the purpose of this act in the particular case."

The object of the proposed legislation is simply to compel children of school age to attend school if they are not already proficient in the common branches, as provided in section 1, or unless such a child is physically or mentally unfit to pursue such studies.

COAST DEFENSES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Our coast defenses as they existed in 1860 were not surpassed in efficiency by those of any country, but within a few years the introduction of rifled cannon and armor in the navies of the world, against which the smoothbore guns were practically useless, rendered them obsolete. For many years no attempt was made to remedy the deficiencies of these seacoast fortifications. There was no establishment in the country equipped for the manufacture of high-power rifled guns; there was no definite adopted policy of coast defense, and Congress was reluctant to undertake a work the cost of which could not be stated even approximately and the details of which had not advanced, so far as could be ascertained, beyond the experimental stages.

The act of March 3, 1883, was the first decisive step taken to secure suitable and adequate ordnance for military purposes. Under the provisions of this act a joint board of officers of the Army and Navy was appointed "for the purpose of examining and reporting to Congress which of the navy-yards or arsenals owned by the Government has the best location and is best adapted for the establishment of a Government foundry, or what other method, if any, should be adopted for the manufacture of heavy ordnance adapted to modern warfare for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States." This board, known as the "Gun Foundry Board," made its report in 1884 and directed public attention not only to the defenseless condition of our coasts, but to the importance and necessity of formulating a comprehensive scheme for the protection of our harbors and coast cities.

As a result, the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, provided that "the President of the United States shall appoint a board * * * which board shall examine and report at what ports fortifications or other defenses are most urgently required, the character and kind of defenses best adapted to each with reference to armament, the utilization of torpedoes, mines, and other defensive appliances."

The board, organized under the foregoing provision of law, popularly known as the "Endicott board, in its report of January 23, 1886, cited the principles on which any system of coast defense should be based, and clearly stated the necessity of having our important strategic and commercial centers made secure against naval attack. In determining the ports that were in urgent need of defense, since a fleet did not exist for the protection of the merchant marine, fortifications were provided at every harbor of importance along the coast and at several of the lake ports. For any particular harbor or locality the report specifies the armament considered necessary for proper protection, the character of emplacements to be used, the number of submarine mines and torpedo boats, with detailed estimates of cost for these various items. The proposed guns, mounts, and emplacements were of types that seemed at that time best suited to accomplish the desired results, based on the only data available, namely, experiments and information of similar work from abroad.

After the report was made part of the public records, the development and adoption of a suitable disappearing gun carriage caused the substitution of open emplacements for the expensive turrets and armored casemates, materially reducing the cost of installing the armament. The great advances in ordnance, increasing the power and range of the later guns, caused a diminution in the number and caliber of the pieces to be mounted, and this fact, combined with advances in the science of engineering, rendered unnecessary the construction of the expensive "floating batteries" designed by the Endicott board for mounting guns to give sufficient fire for the defense of wide channels or for harbors where suitable foundations could not be secured on land. Furthermore, keeping pace with the gradual development and improvement in the engines and implements of war, fortified harbors are equipped with rapid-fire guns, and, to a certain extent, with power plants, searchlights, and a system of fire control and direction, now essential adjuncts of a complete system of defense, though not so considered by that board.

While the details of the scheme of defense recommended by the Endicott board have been departed from, in making provision for later developments of war material, the great value of its report lies in the fact that it sets forth a definite and intelligible plan or policy upon which the very important work of coast defense should proceed, and which is as applicable to-day as when formulated.

The greater effective ranges possible with the later rifled cannon, the necessity of thoroughly covering with gun fire all available waters of approach, and the growth of seacoast towns beyond the limits of some of the military reservations, have combined to move defensive works more to the front, and many of the gun positions now occupied have been obtained from private ownership. The cost of such sites has been a large item in the present cost of fortifications, and this purchase of land was not included in its estimates by the Endicott board.

An examination of the report also discloses the fact that no estimates were submitted covering a supply of ammunition to be kept in reserve for the services of the guns that were recommended, due, perhaps, to the fact that a satisfactory powder to give the energy desired and a suitable projectile to accomplish the desired destruction of armor were still in experimental stages. These questions, however, are no longer in doubt, and Congress already has made provision for some of the ammunition needed.

The omissions in the estimates of the Endicott board and the changes in the details of its plans have caused doubts in the minds of many as to the money that will be needed to defend completely our coasts by guns, mines, and their adjuncts. New localities are pressing their claims for defense. The insular possessions can not be held unless the principal ports, naval bases, and coaling stations are fortified before the outbreak of war. These considerations have led me to appoint a joint board of officers of the Army and Navy "to recommend the armament, fixed and floating, mobile torpedoes, submarine mines, and all other defensive appliances that may be necessary to complete the harbor defense with the most economical and advantageous expenditures of money." The board was further instructed "to extend its examinations so as to include estimates and recommendations relative to defenses of the insular possessions," and to "recommend the order in which the proposed defense shall be completed, so that all the elements of harbor defense may be properly and effectively coordinated."

The board has completed its labors, and its report, together with a letter of transmittal by the Secretary of War, is herewith transmitted for the information of the Congress. It is to be noted that the entrance to Chesapeake Bay, not heretofore recommended or authorized by Congress, is added to the list of ports in the United States to be defended, with the important reasons therefor clearly stated; that the gun defense proper is well advanced toward completion, and that the greater part of the estimate is for new work of gun defense, for the accessories now so necessary for efficiency, and for an allowance of ammunition which, added to that already on hand, will give the minimum supply that should be kept in reserve to successfully meet any sudden attack. The letter of the Secretary of War contains a comparison of the estimates of the Endicott board, with the amounts already appropriated for the present defense and the estimates of the new board, from which it appears that a completed defense of our coast, omitting cost of ammunition and sites, can be accomplished for less than the amount estimated by the Endicott board, even including the additional localities not recommended by it.

In the insular possessions the great naval bases at Guantanamo, Subig Bay, and Pearl Harbor, the coaling stations at Guam and San Juan, require protection, and, in addition, defenses are recommended for Manila Bay and Honolulu, because of the strategic importance of these localities. In the letter of the Secretary of War will be found the sums already appropriated for defenses at some of these ports or harbors, and the estimates are for the completion of an adequate defense at each locality.

Defenses are recommended for the entrances to the Panama Canal as contemplated by the act of June 28, 1902 (Spooner Act), and under the terms of this act the cost of such fortifications would probably be paid from appropriations for the construction and defense of the canal.

The necessity for a complete and adequate system of coast defense is greater to-day than twenty years ago, for the increased wealth of the country offers more tempting inducements to attack and a hostile fleet can reach our coast in a much shorter period of time. The fact that we now have a navy does not in any wise diminish the importance of coast defenses; on the contrary, that fact emphasizes their value and the necessity for their construction. It is an accepted naval maxim that a navy can be used to strategic advantage only when acting on the offensive, and it can be free to so operate only after our coast defense is reasonably secure and so recognized by the country. It was due to the securely defended condition of the Japanese ports that the Japanese fleet was free to seek out and watch its proper objective—the Russian fleet—without fear of interruption or recall to guard its home ports against raids by the Vladivostok squadron. This, one of the most valuable lessons of the late war in the East, is worthy of serious consideration by our country, with its extensive coast line, its many important harbors, and its many wealthy manufacturing coast cities.

The security and protection of our interests require the completion of the defenses of our coast, and the accompanying plan merits and should receive the generous support of the Congress.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose on this occasion to enter into any extended discussion.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will yield to me, I simply wish to offer an amendment to the bill and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table. I shall take advantage of some opportunity to make some remarks upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert at the end of section 25 the following:

Seventh. That said State shall by suitable laws forever prohibit all games of chance for money or other thing of value and shall impose appropriate penalties by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any violation of the same.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say, in justice to myself, that I shall not ask the Senate to adopt that amendment at the time when we adopt the other amendments; but I shall before that time take occasion to make some remarks based upon that amendment which will have application to this proposed legislation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into an extended discussion of the pending bill at this time. I simply wish to now present to the Senate certain facts and statistics which have bearing upon different portions of the bill and upon the bill as an entirety, especially with reference to the question of dividing New Mexico and Arizona into separate States.

The question was asked the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] the other day, when he had the floor and was discussing the statehood bill, as to what was the relative indebtedness of the two Territories, and it was intimated by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], who asked the question, that while New Mexico had a large indebtedness, Arizona had practically none. I find, on looking up the matter, that, according to the latest statistics I have been able to obtain, those contained in the report of the governor of the Territory, that a year ago the bonded debt of Arizona was $1,010,972.43, while the bonded debt of New Mexico was $1,062,000. So, practically, the bonded debts of the two Territories are equal.

I want to say further, in connection with this matter, while I am on that subject, that a good many years ago various counties and municipalities, both in Arizona and New Mexico, issued bonds for local improvements, bonds to aid railroads. Those bonds were litigated and held to be invalid. Afterwards—I can not at this time recall the date—legislation was passed in Congress here which legalized those bonds, both as to Arizona and to New Mexico. In addition to that, a law was passed making these local debts thus legalized in Arizona a part of the funded debt of that Territory. Similar legislation was attempted here in Congress during the first session which I served in this body. An attempt was made to saddle something like $1,000,000 of local debt, that had before that time been legalized by statute upon the Territory of New Mexico. That legislation, however, failed; so that New Mexico to-day has practically no more bonded debt than Arizona.

I next want to call the attention of the Senate to the amount of public land in each of those Territories, the amount that has been appropriated or reserved, and the amount that is still open to appropriation, which means for sale or entry.

In Arizona the total amount of public lands was 72,792,320 acres. I read from a document prepared by the General Land Office July 1, 1894. Since then there has been some slight change, but not much. Of this total area, 5,541,547 acres have been appropriated for various purposes, which means sold or disposed of; at all events the Government has parted with its title to it. Twenty million two hundred and forty-nine thousand one hundred and eighty acres have been reserved, part of it for forest reserves, part for irrigation purposes, and the remainder for Indian reserves. There is in Arizona about that amount at this time. In Arizona there is a total of 47,001,593 acres of unappropriated and undisposed of public lands.

I next call the attention of the Senate to the condition of the public lands in New Mexico. The total amount of public lands in that Territory is 78,428,800 acres. Of this amount 18,820,356 acres have been sold or appropriated and disposed of in various ways; 7,356,104 acres are in reservations either reserved for forest purposes, for irrigation purposes, or for the Indians, leaving a residue of 52,252,340 acres of public land undisposed of in that Territory.

This is the condition in the Territory of Oklahoma: The total amount of public lands in that Territory was 24,718,720 acres. Of this amount, 19,567,824 acres have been appropriated, mainly taken by homestead settlers, and 3,055,469 acres have been reserved for forest purposes, mostly for Indian reservations in that Territory; and there is only a total area of unreserved and unappropriated lands in that Territory of 2,095,427 acres.

I next desire to call the attention of the Senate to the forest reserves in the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. From a letter that I have just received from the head of the Forestry Bureau, Mr. Pinchot, it appears that there are in the Territory of Arizona ten forest reserves, amounting to 8,357,370 acres, with an estimated quantity of timber on it in board measure of 7,714,000,000 feet. In New Mexico there are five forest reservations, containing 5,207,184 acres, and the estimated amount of timber in board measure is 9,200,000,000 feet.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the amount of land that is irrigated or that can be irrigated in the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. My remarks last year were based upon statistics which I then received from the Geological Survey, which has charge of irrigation matters. It appeared that in the two Territories combined there were a total of 502,197 acres of land that were irrigated, or a total of about 800,000 acres that it is possible to irrigate, making an aggregate of 1,302,197 acres, according to the report of the Geological Survey, that were either then irrigated or susceptible of irrigation.

I addressed a letter a short time ago to the Geological Survey to find what changes have taken place in reference to that matter, and here is the information I have secured:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1906.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate.

SIR: Your letter of February 22 has been received, asking regarding development of irrigation in New Mexico and Arizona. There have been relatively small changes in the conditions as given in my letter to you of December 21, 1904. There has been an increase in irrigated acreage by the construction of small irrigation ditches or by the extension of existing canal systems. On the other hand, there has been in some localities a notable decrease of irrigated acreage, owing to the failure of the Arizona canal system and the Pecos Valley Canal, two of the largest irrigating systems which have been operating in the past.

In Arizona the Salt River project will furnish water for at least 165,000 acres, a portion of which is already partly irrigated and is included in the census statistics of irrigated acreage. In the vicinity of Yuma, also, at least 50,000 acres will be irrigated in the near future, most of this being land which has been subject to overflow, but not irrigated systematically in the past.

In New Mexico the Hondo project is nearly completed for the irrigation of about 8,000 acres, and the Carlsbad project will shortly be taken up for the irrigation of about 20,000 acres, restoring water to lands previously irrigated by the Pecos Valley Canal. In the Rio Grande Valley it is probable that in the future 110,000 acres will be supplied with water by storage from the Engle Reservoir.

With these explanations or modifications I think that the general statements given in my previous correspondence, and in the Census report on irrigation in 1902, may be considered as approximately correct.

Very respectfully, CHAS. D. WALCOTT, Director.

Inasmuch as the bill provides for an extensive land grant, I was curious to know the gross amount of land that would be appropriated by it. I have here a letter received from the General Land Office giving a statement of the acreage of public lands that will be disposed of under this bill for school and other purposes in the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and also in Oklahoma. In Oklahoma there is a school grant of two sections to the township—sections 16 and 36. The total number of acres in this will be 1,385,174. Then, in addition to that grant to Oklahoma, section 8 of the bill confers certain lands in section 13 in the Cherokee Outlet, the Tonkawa Indian Reservation, and the Pawnee Indian Reservation, reserved by the President of the United States by proclamation issued August 19, 1893, which amounts to 179,319 acres. Another portion is in the Wichita Reservation, under the act of March 2, 1895, and by amendatory statutes in reference to the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reserves, under which is granted 148,140 acres.

Then, in addition to these general school land grants which I have stated, there are special grants, as follows:

To the State University, 250,000 acres; to the University Preparatory School, 150,000 acres; to the Agricultural College, 250,000 acres; to the Colored Agricultural and Normal University, 100,000 acres, and to the normal schools, 300,000 acres. The aggregate of all the grants made by this bill to the Territory of Oklahoma amounts to 3,090,092 acres of land.

The Indian Territory has no school land, and it is impossible to make a school land grant there, because all the land there belongs to the people of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Hence the bill, in order to make up a sort of equilibrium between the school land grant to Oklahoma and the lack of such a grant to the Indian Territory, makes an appropriation of $5,000,000. While that may seem a large sum, I do not think it will at all compare with the value of the school lands that are granted to Oklahoma. I think the grant to Oklahoma Territory, at the very lowest estimate, is worth more than $10,000,000, perhaps fifteen or twenty million dollars. So the Indian Territory, even with that appropriation of $5,000,000 in cash, will get much less than Oklahoma out of the general fund for the establishment and maintenance of public schools in those Territories.

In Arizona we make a more extensive school grant. We follow the precedent that was established in the case of Utah and one or two other States. Originally, I might say, Mr. President, the school grant to the earlier States of the Mississippi Valley was one section to the township—section 16. The old States like Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois, and, I think, Michigan, got one section to a township for school purposes. Afterwards, as we admitted newer States, we began to give them two sections to the township—sections 16 and 36—and in later instances, in the arid States like Utah and one or two others, we went still further and gave them four sections to the township.

The school land grant in Arizona is a grant of sections 13, 16, 33, and 36, and it will amount to 16,802,348 acres; for public buildings, 128,000 acres; for university, 48,000 acres; another grant to the university of 192,000 acres; for the insane asylum, 200,000 acres; for the penitentiaries, 200,000 acres; for the school for deaf and dumb, 200,000 acres; for the miners' hospitals, 100,000 acres; for the normal schools, 200,000 acres; for State charitable and other institutions, 200,000 acres; for agricultural colleges, 300,000 acres; for the school of mines, 200,000 acres; and for the military institute, 200,000 acres.

To New Mexico the following grants are made: For reservoirs, 500,000 acres; for the improvement of the Rio Grande, 100,000 acres; for the insane asylum, 50,000 acres; for the school of mines, 50,000 acres; for the deaf and dumb asylum, 50,000 acres; for the reform school, 50,000 acres; for the normal school, 100,000 acres; for the institute for the blind, 50,000 acres; for the miners' hospital, 50,000 acres; for the military institute, 50,000 acres; for the penitentiaries, 50,000 acres; and for the university, 46,080 acres.

I made a mistake if I said that this school land grant of 18,000,000 acres was for Arizona alone. It includes both Arizona and New Mexico. The total grant of public lands for these two Territories is 20,116,428 acres. This may seem an immense grant—four sections to the township.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like in this connection, before leaving the question of land grants for school purposes, to make some inquiry of the Senator as to his understanding of the situation in which the proposed new State would find itself so far as the lands for school purposes are concerned. I understand the Senator to have said—or perhaps it was another Senator—in discussing the question, that, outside of the land that had been withdrawn for irrigation purposes, there was very little, if any, arable land or land available for settlement.

Mr. NELSON. I did not say that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it has been so stated. I think it was stated at the last session.

Mr. NELSON. I read the statistics of the land that had been appropriated or disposed of, the statistics of land that had been reserved for all purposes, and the statistics of the land that was still unappropriated, and then I read in detail the amount included in the two Territories in forest reservations. There are ten forest reserves in Arizona and five in New Mexico. I gave the acreage of each, and then from the report of the Geological Survey for last year I gave the amount of land that had been irrigated and that was susceptible of irrigation at that time. Then I supplemented that with a statement, in the shape of a letter, which I received from Mr. Walcott, showing the modifications and changes that should be made in respect to the statement I made a year ago.

Mr. HEYBURN. I so understood the Senator, and I thought it would quite repay us at this time, in order to have it together in the RECORD, to make some investigation as to whether or not this grant of lands for educational purposes represented a real grant or a Barmecide feast. Now, I should like to call the Senator's attention to some of his figures just stated. According to the official statement, the forest reserves already withdrawn and created in the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico aggregate 13,564,554 acres—that is, withdrawn for forest purposes.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The lands that are withdrawn for irrigation purposes, under the reclamation act, of course, are not available for the purpose of selecting school lands.

Mr. NELSON. Of course not.

Mr. HEYBURN. So that, taking the total area of arable land, or land possible of settlement and cultivation, to be made up of the forest reserves and of lands that can be made available only by reclamation, how much land is there left from which to select indemnity school lands and the other land grants of the proposed State? If the Senator can give me that information, I should be glad to have it.

Mr. NELSON. There are oceans of it. I have just read the figures.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the Senator's figures before me.

Mr. NELSON. There are oceans of unappropriated public lands in the two Territories. There is no difficulty at all about filling the grant and making indemnity selections. In New Mexico there are still—or there were a year ago, and there have not been many changes since—52,252,000 acres of unappropriated public land, and in Arizona there were 47,000,000 acres of unappropriated public land, nearly 100,000,000 acres of unappropriated public land in the two Territories.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will it interrupt the Senator if we consider it from that basis for a moment by a few questions, I hope well directed, to get at what the real assets of the school fund will be in Arizona?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator knows it is impossible for any Senator to answer that, because no man can say what those lands will be sold for. I am coming to that question. I was going to state to the Senate the reasons why this grant is much more extensive than the grant to Oklahoma and some States. Instead of two sections to the township, it is proposed to grant to Arizona and New Mexico four sections, because the lands are poor and arid and will undoubtedly bring but a small amount. It will be largely a question of irrigation as to how soon money can be derived from that source.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it will not interrupt the Senator, does the Senator understand that under the provision of this bill lands that are valuable only through the reclamation process are available for the school fund?

Mr. NELSON. No; I understand that where land is undisposed of in the first place the State gets absolutely four sections in each township if they are vacant and unappropriated.

Mr. HEYBURN. What does the Senator understand by being "undisposed of?" Would forest reserves take them out of the list?

Mr. NELSON. They would then be in a state of reservation and could not be selected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then would reclamation withdrawal also take them out?

Mr. NELSON. That would hold them in a state of reservation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the school lands which are granted nominally could not be selected either from forest reserves or from lands available under the reclamation process?

Mr. NELSON. I think not.

Mr. HEYBURN. What other lands are there in Arizona and New Mexico that would form a substantial basis of settlement upon which the growth of that proposed State may rest?

Mr. NELSON. Well, there are in the two Territories upward of 100,000,000 acres of land that are not in a state of reservation.

Mr. HEYBURN. But are they of any value?

Mr. NELSON. That is a question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would they all form a substantial basis of value for the school fund?

Mr. NELSON. I might ask the question, Will those 100,000,000 acres form a substantial basis for a State?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the question. It has been asserted that they would not; that this proposed State had no possible future through growth that depended upon these lands outside of the forest reclamation lands at present.

Mr. NELSON. I take it that in time, if the Senator wants my judgment—and I can only give him that—in time, gradually some of these lands will be irrigated on a small scale. I do not apprehend that all irrigation will simply be confined to what the Government does. We have laws under which desert lands can be entered and irrigated.

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I simply desire to ask a question.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Minnesota is making a very interesting statement, and I know he wants to be right. He stated a moment ago that Utah and other arid States were granted four sections of school lands.

Mr. NELSON. As to Utah, I am confident that is so.

Mr. WARREN. My information is that Utah had four sections, but that no other State had so many.

Mr. NELSON. Well, perhaps I may be mistaken. I am sure about Utah. [To Mr. SMOOT:] Am I not correct?

Mr. SMOOT. Utah was granted sections 2, 16, 32, and 36.

Mr. NELSON. Four sections.

Mr. WARREN. But no other State in the Union was granted so many sections.

Mr. NELSON. Perhaps the Senator is correct.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask what other sections make up the four other than the sixteenth and the thirty-sixth?

Mr. NELSON. In Arizona and New Mexico?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. Sections 13, 16, 33, and 36.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have only to say that I find no fault whatever that four sections are proposed to be granted to New Mexico and Arizona. I am glad that they are to have that much. The grants to the proposed new States in this bill are liberal all the way through. I may say that, aside from the school sections, they are several times what they have been in the other States; but that simply proves to me that the other States did not have nearly enough. I think the present bill is all right, for there is no more land to be given to the proposed States than they ought to have.

Mr. NELSON. I do not agree with the Senator in that. I think if you take the question of value into consideration, the grant to New Mexico and Arizona does not begin to be as good as the grant to Oklahoma, for instance.

Mr. WARREN. That is true; but I am speaking of the other arid States. I wish to make no point on it, because that has all passed.

Mr. NELSON. I am not prepared to speak on that. But take the States that are not arid or are only semiarid. I think this grant of four sections to the township does not begin to be as valuable even as one section to the township was in Wisconsin, Iowa, and some of the older States.

Mr. WARREN. In my judgment, the Senator is absolutely right; but I want to say, as we go along, although the wrong of that is passed and can not be rectified now, that the other arid States, in addition to Utah, should have had four sections of public land instead of two.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is perfectly right. I will not discuss that with him. We can not mend those matters of the past; but the committee felt confident that this grant, in view of the character of the land and the resources of the country, was none too much. I apprehend—though it is only a rough guess of mine—that to-day those lands as an entirety perhaps would not be worth over from 50 cents to a dollar an acre, while in Oklahoma, I have no doubt that the school lands are worth all the way from ten to twenty dollars an acre.

Of course, it will be something of a problem, because this land will not be of much help until the State can dispose of it; but as the lands become improved, cultivated, irrigated, and settled, gradually they will be disposed of at a very fair price, especially such portions as can be irrigated.

I think, in all fairness to this new proposed State, that if I had my way about it, in addition to this land grant, I would give them an appropriation of a few million dollars to start with as a school fund, in order to make a beginning until they can dispose of and market these lands and secure a fund, because the lands will not be available for school purposes until the State can dispose of them, get the money, and let that money out at interest, and thus obtain revenue.

Mr. President, in addition to the figures which I have given the Senate, I have here a table which I will ask to have incorporated in my remarks, giving a list of the States as they have been admitted into the Union since 1812, showing the population of those States at the time of their admission or at the census nearest to it, and showing the ratio of population for each Representative in Congress. While if you go away back and look at the population each State had when admitted, it may seem small in comparison with the States admitted in recent years, yet, when you compare it with the ratio of representation in Congress at that time, you will find that as a rule every State which was admitted had enough for at least one Representative in Congress and in many instances more.

In connection with my statement in reference to the land grants in the three Territories of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico, I desire to present a memorandum from the Interior Department, explaining more in detail the effects and limitations of the grants, and to have it incorporated in my remarks.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM AS TO THE EFFECT OF CERTAIN SECTIONS OF SENATE BILL 1158, FOR THE ADMISSION OF OKLAHOMA AND INDIAN TERRITORY, NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA, RELATIVE TO PUBLIC LANDS GRANTED TO THE NEW STATES FOR EDUCATIONAL AND PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT PURPOSES.

(1) By section 12 of the bill, 1,050,000 acres in gross are granted to the proposed State of Oklahoma, in lieu of lands for internal improvements, swamp lands, etc. These lands are to be selected by the board for leasing school lands of the Territory, the only duty of the Department in the premises being the ministerial duty of withdrawing from entry the selections so made.

By section 29 of the bill, 1,800,000 acres are granted to the proposed State of Arizona, in lieu of grants for internal improvements, swamp lands, etc. By section 30 it is provided that these lands shall be selected, "under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior," by a commission composed of the governor, the surveyor-general, and the attorney-general of said State. There is no "board for leasing school lands" in New Mexico; and the system of leasing Territorial lands in that Territory has not been developed so far as it has in Oklahoma. There is, however, a "board of public lands," which has heretofore both leased and sold certain Territorial lands, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

(2) Sections 7 and 8 of the bill grant to Oklahoma sections 16 and 36 for school purposes and sections 13 and 33 for university and public-improvement purposes. There is no provision in that part of the bill which relates to Oklahoma excepting either from these grants or from the grant of 1,050,000 acres in gross above mentioned the lands known to be mineral in character. It has always been the custom heretofore to except mineral lands from grants made to new States for educational and public-improvement purposes. In Oklahoma there are, among other mineral lands, several sections which are very valuable for oil and gas purposes. Thousands of dollars have been offered for the lease of less than a single section of school land near Cleveland, Okla., but the applicant was informed that neither the Department nor the Territory could make such a lease for mineral purposes under existing law.

In the portion of the bill granting lands to the proposed new State of Arizona (see sections 23–26 and 29) there is a provision expressly excepting lands known to be mineral in character. Said provision is found in section 31, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 31. That all mineral lands shall be exempted from the grants made by this act; but if any portion thereof shall be found by the Department of the Interior to be mineral lands, said State is hereby authorized and empowered to select, in legal subdivisions, an equal quantity of other unappropriated lands in said State."

It is possible that this section was intended to except mineral lands from the grants made to both Arizona and Oklahoma, as it does not mention either State. In view, however, of its position among the provisions relating exclusively to Arizona, and in view of its indefinite language, it seems not unlikely that, under the rule of noscitur a sociis, this section would be construed as excepting mineral lands only from those grants which are made to Arizona, and as not affecting the grants made to Oklahoma.

Under the bill as framed Oklahoma would appear to be favored above all the other Territories; and certain rights granted to that State by the bill are denied to the State to be created out of Arizona and New Mexico.

(3) Sections 9 and 10 authorize the leasing of lands granted to Oklahoma for periods of not exceeding five years, "under such regulations as the legislature may prescribe." Oklahoma has now an elaborate system of leasing school lands. Perhaps, therefore, the insertion in the present bill similar to that which was included in the bill pending during the last Congress (H. R. 14749) might be found useful, to wit, "and until such time as the legislature shall prescribe the same, this and all other lands granted to the State may be leased under existing rules and regulations."

(4) It appears that the 1,050,000 acres granted in gross to Oklahoma by section 12 of the bill are absolutely at the disposal of the legislature of said Territory. Section 28 of the bill, however, provides that "all lands herein granted for educational purposes may be appraised and disposed of only at public sale," etc., or may be leased; but this section is placed among the provisions relating exclusively to Arizona; and as the last sentence is a repetition of a similar provision in the part of the bill relating to Oklahoma, and the section does not indicate that it was intended to apply to both States, it would probably (as in the case of section 31 of the bill above referred to) be held to apply only to the State of Arizona.

The act for the admission of North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington (22 Stat., 676) provided (sec. 11), among other things, that "all lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of only at public sale, and at a price not less than $10 per acre," but that the lands might be leased for not exceeding five years, and in quantities not exceeding one section to any one person or company.

In Oklahoma many square miles of land have been leased to the same person or company, at prices far below the real value of the land, thus working injury both upon the Territory itself and upon prospective settlers; and the persons who secured these large tracts, not satisfied with the great profits which they have reaped in the past, are now claiming perpetual rights over the tracts leased by them; or, as has happened in many cases, they have subdivided the lands into half or quarter sections, and transferred their rights over these small parcels to actual home seekers, receiving large sums for such transfer.

(5) There are several bills pending before Congress looking to the creation of national parks in Arizona and New Mexico, to wit: The Petrified Forest National Park, in Arizona, and the Pajarito Cliff Dwellers' National Park, in New Mexico. Regarding the proposed Petrified Forest Park, the Commissioner of the General Land Office states in his last annual report as follows:

"In view of the well-known importance of securing efficient protection for the natural wonders of this region, I urgently renew my recommendation that this measure, which, as stated, has already been passed by the House of Representatives in three successive Congresses, be given the early approval of Congress at its next session."

A bill having in view the creation of a national park at this place has been introduced at the present session of Congress.

The Department has several times recommended the passage of an act establishing the proposed Pajarito Cliff Dwellers' National Park, in New Mexico, and a bill for that purpose was introduced during the last Congress, but failed to become a law. Part of the land proposed to be included in such park is now included in a reservation for the use of the Santa Clara Pueblo Indians, and the remainder of the tract is included in the Jemez Forest Reserve (proposed).

If the lands above referred to are to be set aside as national parks and exclusive jurisdiction thereof is to be retained by the United States, it would seem advisable that a provision be inserted in this statehood bill describing such lands by metes and bounds, setting the same aside as national parks, and expressly reserving jurisdiction and sovereignty over the same to the United States.

(6) In section 7, page 9, lines 21–23, which grants to the State of Oklahoma sections 16 and 36 in every township in the Territory of that name, "and all indemnity lands heretofore selected in lieu thereof," there is a proviso reading as follows:

"Provided, That there is sufficient untaken public land within said State to cover this grant."

As no specific quantity of land is granted by this section, it is not understood just how this proviso is applicable to the grant made by this section. In section 12 of the bill, grants are made in bulk or quantity, amounting to 1,050,000 acres, and a provision such as that above quoted would therefore readily be understood if placed in that section. It is not known, however, whether such was the intention.

(7) In section 8, page 12, line 2, the word "settled" appears to have been printed in place of "selected."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, from the data I have presented it appears that the forest reserves and the land that is irrigated or possible of irrigation to-day in the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico do not quite aggregate 15,000,000 acres out of a total acreage of nearly 150,000,000, or a total acreage of over 135,000,000 of unappropriated public lands. Outside of the mining industries in those Territories this area of 15,000,000 acres represents for the present, and I may say the future, the possibilities of the proposed State of Arizona and New Mexico as an agricultural and grazing State. It will be as though you had a State of 15,000,000 acres devoted to grazing and agricultural purposes, and the rest of the Territory simply subject to mining purposes and development by irrigation in the far-distant future if water can be secured.

I may say the great problem of irrigation in that country is not the building of reservoirs, is not the securing of land for irrigation, but the great problem is to secure the water, which is very scarce there, the country being dependent mainly upon a few streams. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] the other day well said, speaking of the importance of having these two Territories together as one State, one of the principal irrigating streams in the proposed new State is the Gila River. In fact, outside of one or two other streams, it is the principal stream from which a water supply can be secured for irrigation. That stream has its source in the Territory of New Mexico and flows a hundred and fifty or two hundred miles from its source before it reaches the Territory of Arizona.

If you leave that stream—and it is a very important one to that country—in two States, you are liable to be confronted with the same difficulties which now exist in reference to the Rio Grande. Those on the lower portion of that river complain that the authorities of Colorado are impounding the water and depriving the country on the stream below of the necessary quantity of water. Such a question might arise if you have these Territories separate. It might happen that New Mexico would impound all the water on the upper portion of the Gila River, and thus entirely deprive the remainder of the country on the stream lower down in the Territory of Arizona of the necessary quantity of water, whereas if the two Territories are united in one State, the State would have control of all portions of the stream, and the entire stream would be subject to such laws as the State might adopt.

I will not take up the time of the Senate much longer, for three years ago I discussed this matter very extensively—for a period of six days—and I discussed it again for two days a year ago, and I am afraid the Senate has become somewhat tired of hearing from me on this subject. But I wish merely to call attention to one thing, and that is this: Three years ago, when the statehood bill was up, the proposition was to establish four States, making each of those four Territories a separate State. The people of the Indian Territory and of Oklahoma were at that time very much in favor of it.

I made the argument then, and advanced the proposition on the floor of the Senate, that on account of the commercial resources, the railroad facilities, and the natural characteristics of the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, they ought to be united and made into one great State. I am happy to say that the argument I then made and the argument which was made by colleagues of mine on the floor of the Senate have borne fruit in those Territories. To-day, with the exception of a few people whom nothing will satisfy, the great majority of the people of those Territories are of one accord, and feel that they should be united as one State and become one of the great States of this Union.

Mr. President, I feel that in time the same spirit will fall upon the people of Arizona and New Mexico. They are handicapped in one way in which the people of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory were not handicapped. Oklahoma and the Indian Territory had a large population of whites—a half million in each Territory—enterprising and aggressive men, who had gone there to build up towns and to open farms. The two Territories were densely populated, with no particular or special interests to dominate them or lead them astray, and the people could find a free and full expression of their views. In consequence, while at the outset the people in those two Territories were utterly opposed to a Union, to-day they are of one accord and have come together.

Without questioning the motives or purposes of anybody, either inside of this Chamber or outside, it is my conviction that if conditions in respect to population, in respect to special and peculiar interests, were the same in Arizona and New Mexico as they are in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, the people of those Territories would be glad to be united in one great State. But unfortunately in those two Territories, especially in Arizona, there are certain special interests which have a dominating influence in those Territories, and they so dominate the people that what would be found to be the public opinion of those Territories does not find expression as it otherwise would.

I have no doubt that if those people unite themselves into one State, they will live together in harmony and in peace and ultimately develop their country into a great State. It will be a great State in area—next to the State of Texas—and ultimately, in the course of time, in the years to come, it will be something of an agricultural State, and doubtless always will be a great mining State.

There is another reason which I think ought to be urged why these Territories ought to be united. It is this: Aside from the value of the mines, the Territories are really poor, comparatively speaking. I mean that the natural resources of the two are, comparatively speaking, not very large. It is quite a burden to establish a full-fledged State government, and unless the people have material resources, unless there is a population to bear the burden, it will become indeed a heavy load. By uniting these two Territories into one State, the burden of statehood will not be heavier for both combined than it would be for one of the Territories separately.

There is, to my mind, another reason, although it may seem a little ungracious to mention it here. I do not mention it in any invidious spirit. I refer to it in the spirit of an American who desires to see his country homogeneous and of one language and one spirit. In New Mexico, as you know, nearly half the population are of Spanish descent. They have been good enough citizens; they are good loyal citizens to-day, but they are still to a large extent Spanish in language and in spirit.

Now, by uniting what is called the "American element" in New Mexico and the American element in Arizona into one State that element will there, as everywhere throughout this country, dominate the new State. They would not be pulling apart from one another. The Americans in New Mexico would not be hostile and adverse to the Americans in Arizona. A common spirit, a common education and training, and that love of country which appertains to all the citizens of this land, that Anglo-Saxon spirit, which came over here with the Pilgrim fathers, would actuate them all, and they would in time form a great State.

I know if we ever succeed in uniting them together into a great State they will be like the State of Texas; they will never want to separate again into separate States. They will feel, to use a Scriptural expression, that whatever the Almighty has united let no man put asunder. We gave permission to Texas to form itself into four or five States. Texas has never availed herself of that privilege, and I think never will.

So, Mr. President, I feel confident that if for the good of these people, for their own future good, we could unite them into one great State, after a few years of experience they would not only thoroughly Americanize the Mexican portion of New Mexico, but they would become so homogeneous in language, in spirit, in all that pertains to the best in American institutions, that no portion or parcel would ever want to be segregated from the rest of it into a new State.

We hear a good deal said, Mr. President, as to what the wishes of the people may be. Ordinarily we ought to assent to the wishes of the people, but sometimes it is better for us to use our own judgment. These Territories are the children of Uncle Sam. Ordinarily the kind parent sees to the wishes of his children, but sometimes the wise parent finds it judicious to take the bit in his own mouth and to curb the zeal and the energy of his children and keep them within the proper channel.

The lesson, if I may say so, the instruction, the admonition that we gave to the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory three years ago has borne good fruit. At that time I have no doubt the majority of the people were hostile, and thought that the Congress of the United States was their enemy and was not dealing with them fairly. Yet to-day they are of an entirely different opinion. They have come to the conclusion that what we then wanted to do for them and what we still want to do for them is the part of wisdom by a good parent to his children.

What we have done for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory we propose to do for Arizona and New Mexico. The area, the outer boundaries, of the two Territories may be much greater, but in respect to material resources, in all that goes to make up a State really, the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico do not even equal one of the Territories of Oklahoma or Indian Territory that we propose to unite.

If this bill passes, as I hope it will pass, I have no doubt but that the people of these Territories will get together, adopt a free and liberal constitution, elect their State officers, their county officers, their municipal officers, and elect their Representatives in Congress and Senators and send them here to Congress, and that in time the new State of Arizona will be one of the bright stars in the Federal flag that we can all be proud of.

I for one, speaking for myself, am actuated in this matter not by a spirit of hostility, but by what I regard to be for the interests of the people in those Territories; by what I feel should be done for the future of that country, in order to make that whole country homogeneous and truly American in spirit; in order to make it not what they used to call in old England before the days of the reform bill, "rotten boroughs." In order that this may not be a rotten borough, but that it may be one of the living and one of the strong and one of the active and energetic States in the American Union, I trust that we can succeed in having them united.

I do not know that I care to take up the time of the Senate any further in connection with the remarks that I have made.

I will ask to append and incorporate in them a statement showing, as I stated a moment ago, the ratio of population to a Representative in Congress at each of our different censuses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator's request is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. NELSON. This table is remarkable, and I will only call attention to it for a moment. It not only shows the ratio of population at each census, but it also shows the population of the several States from the time Louisiana was admitted, in 1812, to the present time. It gives the population of the several States as compared with the ratio for Representative at the time of their admission, and you can see how it has changed and fluctuated. We started out in 1790 and in 1800 with a ratio of 33,000 people to a Representative in Congress, and from that on we have been gradually growing until the present ratio is 194,000.

Now, if you eliminate the Indians, the negroes, and the Mexicans from the population of these two Territories, you will have about people enough for a Representative and a half. We allow this proposed new State for every possible growth that may have taken place since the last census, and we give them two Representatives in Congress. Of course I am not here to criticise what has taken place in the past. Many of the States that we admitted then had not a very large population, but they have become fine States, growing and prosperous. They have been valuable members of the community, and they have most valuable and efficient representatives in both Houses of Congress.

But I feel, Mr. President, that in this matter here and from now on in admitting a new State we ought to act upon the theory that when a State comes in it ought to have population enough to give it at least as many Members of the House of Representatives as it has in this body. In other words, every State coming in will have two Senators in this body. I think in the future our guide ought to be that when a Territory comes into the Union it ought to have a population big enough to give it at least two members in the other body as well as in this body.

It is said on this occasion by those who are now opposing the bill that we should let these Territories stay outside. I do not say that that is the view of anybody in this Chamber, but I think it is true of many on the outside that they are using that argument simply as a temporary expedient. They came here three years ago eager and anxious for statehood for each of these Territories. Their only hope now is to defeat it. I refer to interests outside of this Chamber, not to anybody in the Chamber. Their only hope now is for the time being to defeat this bill, and if they succeed in accomplishing that and get Oklahoma and Indian Territory admitted, Arizona and New Mexico will come here each of them knocking separately for admission, and we will still have the problem on our hands. I think now is the accepted time to settle this question and dispose of the whole problem.

It will leave us outside of our colonial possessions only Alaska, and Alaska is a country that is still in an embryo condition. With its immense territory of 590,000 square miles, and with its vast seaboard line, and with its scant and scattered population of 40,000 or 50,000 Americans, with perhaps 30,000 natives, it will be years before Alaska will come before Congress in the shape of either asking for a full legislative Territorial government or asking for statehood in any shape.

I have no doubt in the years to come, in the years of my grandchildren perhaps, even Alaska will come here asking for admission into the Union, not as a single State, but perhaps as three States. The coast line, the Aleutian Archipelago, and the archipelago along the British boundary, and the south shore, "southern Alaska," as it is called, will no doubt some day come knocking at the doors of Congress for admission as a State; then the great interior of that country, the great Yukon and Tanana and Koyukuk valleys will come to Congress and ask for admission as a State; and by and by Seward Peninsula, with its 30,000 square miles, with its endless amount of gold-bearing creeks and the country beyond that will be knocking at the doors of Congress. If we who are now in this Chamber could look down upon this world of ours one hundred years hence I have no doubt that we would find three States in this Union from what now constitutes a portion of the territory of Alaska.

I refer to these things, Mr. President, incidentally for the purpose of calling attention to the importance in the admission of States now and hereafter of being guided by sound and safe principles. While it is always well, under reasonable circumstances, to listen to the wishes and views of the people inhabiting the country, yet we should, under all circumstances, exercise that judgment and thoughtful care which a kind parent exercises over the welfare of his children, and never allow the children, except where we deem it to be right, to have their own way about everything.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I intended, before I sat down, on behalf of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] to announce that on to-morrow he will address the Senate on this bill at 2 o'clock, and that on Thursday next the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], immediately after the morning business, will close the debate on behalf of the opponents of this bill, and at 2 o'clock Thursday the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] will close the debate on behalf of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to call up a bill of only four lines?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly. I will withhold the motion for the present.

COMMISSIONS OF RETIRED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 3918) to authorize commissions to issue in the cases of officers of the Army retired with increased rank.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That officers of the Army on the retired list whose rank has been, or shall hereafter be, advanced by operation of or in accordance with law shall be entitled to and shall receive commissions in accordance with such advanced rank.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes, p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 6, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of House bill 12973, to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE SPEAKER HENDERSON.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st day of this month, at the funeral of ex-Speaker David B. Henderson, a beautiful memorial, historical in its character, was delivered by Hon. George D. Perkins, of Iowa, formerly a Member of this House and a colleague of the late Speaker Henderson. I ask unanimous consent that this brief memorial be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a memorial address by the Hon. George B. Perkins, of Iowa, at the funeral of the late Speaker of the House, David B. Henderson, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The memorial is as follows:

To bring at such a time a loving tribute to a friend, distinguished as Colonel Henderson was distinguished, is a high office. It is a time when the infirmity of speech is felt—a time when the heart appeals for words the tongue can not frame. When we are gathered as we are here, standing as it were on the bridge that unites the worlds, our conscious sense reveals the impotence of all we can do and the feebleness of all we can say by ourselves alone. The clouds hang low and the day is dark; we have the dizziness of swaying, and instinctively we stretch forth our hand in feeling after the hand of God. If so be we reach it we have thrill of soul. I can not speak to you as I would. I shrink from saying anything, oppressed by the fear that what I may say shall be discord in the loving symphony of your hearts.

What Colonel Henderson wrought is preserved in the coldness of type on many pages; what he was and the things for which he strove are known to those who had his love, his friendship, and his great solicitude. Throughout his life, while his mind had strength, he was a helpful man. Out of his helpfulness came his glory. He was naturally a leader; he was always a soldier. In his Congressional district he was "Our Dave." He belonged to his people; there was the sense of partnership, if not of ownership, and men did for him the better to do for themselves. The greatness of his heart broke down barriers, and into his life came trooping the multitude. He welcomed all alike—the rich, the poor, the proud, the lowly, the joyful, the sorrowful, the few of strength, and the many with heavy burden. Where he stood was the shining of the sun, and in his atmosphere was warmth and the cheer of it. He was a rich contributor to the needs of men; and he had such tenderness as to dry the tears of women and such magician's art as to pluck the appearance of trouble from the faces of children. "Our Dave!" He never bore a prouder title.

Our friend was a native of Old Deer, Scotland; but essentially he was an Iowan—broadly speaking, an American. He was 6 years old when the family arrived in Illinois, and he was 9 years old when settlement was made on a farm in Fayette County of this State. He was a working boy—a farmer's boy. He attended the neighborhood school; he led the simple life and grew to a lusty manhood. He was a student in the Upper Iowa University in 1861, when the call came for men for the saving of the Union. He surrendered his own plans; he joined in fanning the fires of patriotism, and on a September day, a leader among his mates, he put his name to an enlistment roll as a private soldier. He was chosen first lieutenant to Company C, Twelfth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and with that noble regiment he went to the front. That was the beginning of his long service to his State and to his country. At Donelson he was wounded, at Corinth he lost a leg, and on February 16, 1863, he was discharged. But he only accepted a furlough, for in May following he was appointed commissioner of the board of enrollment for the Third district of Iowa, and he served in that place until June, 1864, when he reentered the Army as colonel of the Forty-sixth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and served therein to the close of the term for which the regiment was enlisted.

He was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1865, and from November of that year until June, 1869, he was collector of internal revenue for this district, and then he resigned to become a member of the law firm of Shiras, Van Duzee & Henderson. In 1882 he was elected Representative in Congress from the Third district, and he continued in that office for twenty years—the last four years in the great office of Speaker. He served for a longer time in the House of Representatives than any Iowa man has yet served, and his record in that body is not likely soon to be matched by a Representative from this State. His service throughout was characteristic of the man. It was efficient, patriotic, and uniformly in distinguished place. He was a recognized leader in that body long before his Speakership, serving on the Committee on Appropriations, on the Committee on Judiciary, and on the Committee on Rules. With the retirement of the late Thomas B. Reed he was the unanimous choice of his political associates for the exalted station Mr. Reed surrendered, and on the expiration of his first term as Speaker he was unanimously reelected. Had he remained in Congress he would with like unanimity been continued in the place. In 1902 the convention of his party in this Congressional district tendered him a renomination. He decided not to accept it. He decided to retire from public life. He acted on his own motion and with the courage that never failed him. His announcement was a shock to his friends and a surprise to the State and to the country. But having determined upon his course, no amount of persuasion could turn him from it.

It seemed a pity that his brilliant public career should end as it did; and yet there is this to turn to—that it ended with honors at his feet and with the love and confidence of his people unshaken. There are so many exceptions that we do not need on this account to add one atom to the weight of our regret. We may even say that it was best that it should be so. It may well be a pity, nevertheless, that so many men come to the end of their public service under circumstances we count in the retrospect as unhappy. There is no sting to mortal life like that of ingratitude. To be misunderstood, to have all thought of kindness and of service swept away, and to be brought face to face with the undiscerning and passionate struggle of partisan selfishness, when one's years are come within hailing distance of the limit of a lifetime, puts strong hearts to such cruel test that there are many broken. So it is that there is much superficial judgment that the public service is to be shunned; and yet we know that out of this service have we all the greatness, the wonderful opportunity, and the glory of this Government which in the process of time has worked out the union, the progress, the shining example, of these States, constituting under God, as I believe, one great Republic.

The youth of Colonel Henderson in his love of country was never old, and though he had lived twice his years yet would the ardor of it make no sign of age. I wish I had in this hour the eloquence with which he was wont to speak. In his young manhood he took an oath of allegiance to the Stars and Stripes, and where that flag led, if he did not himself bear it, he followed always and unfalteringly. There was no shiftiness is his patriotism, no shrinking in the loyalty of his service, and no pride that withheld his hand from friend associated with him in triumph or from foe prostrate in defeat. He was known as a manly man; and so he was known in the House of Representatives, where he so long served. He won the admiration of his political opponents, for they learned that they could take him at his word. He fought in the open and not by intrigue; his word was as an all-sufficient bond. He was scrupulously careful of his political promises; he would not run from them to cover. This was the secret of his great power in the House of Representatives. He was a partisan, to be sure, but he was fair, he rung true, he was honest. His enthusiasm was as the march of an army, and in the midst of the clash of angry debate his voice resounded above the din like blast of bugle. He was always in the thick of it, but from every battle he came out a larger man. Thus it was that he came to be Speaker, the highest office in the Government to which he was eligible, and the first man ever chosen to that place of distinction and great power from a State west of the Mississippi River.

For a period of years, and in a formative period of Republican triumph, he stood in full stature as a national leader—which is to say, a national representative. He was a councilor and a fighter. In the great national convention of his party he helped to form the line of battle. In the conventions of his State he was always to be reckoned with. Here, again, a question of loyalty was never placed against his name. He lived and did his greatest work in a time of marvelous achievement, wherefrom in this present time there is much of bounty, much of reward, much of the fruit of hope and of striving, affording safe harbor and secure anchorage. A time like this may well move us to consider our great debt, which in no measure can we discharge except that we shall serve, so far as strength is lodged with us, as we have been served.

It may be true that Colonel Henderson was often controlled by his sympathies, and I honor him for that. He was lion-hearted, and yet he was tender-hearted. His love of Iowa he kept green, and he gave it nurture, as the garden of his flowers, down to the last sad days of his conscious life. When he retired from Congress he had thought of opportunity elsewhere. He went to New York and mixed with the strange faces and the confusion of that mighty city. But one day came word that he would return to this his city and to this his State, and that here he would pass the remainder of his days. Possibly the consciousness was upon him that his time of initiation and of struggle was well-nigh over; at least there came to him the sense of loneliness and the longing for home. And so it was that hands here and from over the State were outstretched to him in unanimous bidding that he come. Alas that he should already have entered upon the greatest, the most heroic battle of his life. He sought restoration in California. The tenderest of loving hearts were with him; but as the weeks passed the sorrowful story took form that he was being pressed by an implacable foe toward the darkness of the river. He returned in the early months of a new year; he saw these familiar hillsides take on their color; he saw the trees that line these familiar streets break their buds and expand their foliage; he saw the faces of old friends—and as the summer waned the night came on. But he was at home. Aye, now let us say he is at home, and peace be his for ever more.

I shall remember him as he was in the brilliancy of his mind and in the buoyancy of his physical strength. I shall remember him as the comrade he was, the life of every company. He had more sunshine than he had need of for himself and he warmed men and made them glad. He dignified high station, and out of his great heart he wove countless wreaths for humble lives. Of these latter there will be some in my own coffin.

His life was an example and an inspiration: The poor boy on the farm, the soldier going to the front, his cruel hurt, his indomitable spirit, his struggle for a better place among men; how he builded from the web of opportunity, gained admission to a learned profession, took a place with distinguished lawyers, year by year added to his power; chosen to represent his district in Congress, advanced there to great influence, receiving at the last the homage of the office which is only second to the Presidency—this poor boy, born over the sea. He had many contests; we may know he had defeats, for we have come here now with our tears and with our benedictions.

All the struggle is over, the varying tide of it and its pain. We can add nothing to his fame; we can not put his heart to beating, and there is no power in earthly love to recall the soul that has taken flight. The lifelong soldier has been mustered out. His commission is with his people.

David Bremner Henderson—but not that. "Our Dave," hail to you and farewell!

RELIEF OF CERTAIN SETTLERS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10480) for the relief of certain settlers upon land within the indemnity limits of the present St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all qualified homesteaders who made settlement upon and improved any of the land hereinafter designated and who were prevented from securing title to such land by reason of the contracts hereinafter described shall, in making final proof upon homestead entries made for other lands, be given credit for the period of their bona fide residence on and the amount of their respective improvements upon the land for which they were so prevented from completing title, including the time of continuous residence upon and improvements of said land while defending in good faith their respective claims thereto as homestead settlers. The land above referred to is that part of the indemnity grant to the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company defined by the acts of Congress dated, respectively, March 3, 1857 (11 Stats., p. 195, chap. 99), and March 3, 1865 (13 Stats., p. 526, chap. 105), which by reason of certain contracts between Rev. John Ireland and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company, one dated July 17, 1880, and one dated March 30, 1883, (more particularly described in the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office contained in his letter of December 3, 1898, in the appeal of the case of John Ireland against Joseph Bennon and others from the action of the local land office and at St. Cloud, Minn.), the said John Ireland and those with whom he contracted to sell certain of said lands, either for himself or for said railway company, were held authorized to purchase from the United States under the provision of section 5 of the act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stats., p. 556), after the date upon which the claim of said railway company to receive said lands as indemnity lands had been denied and canceled by the Interior Department: Provided, That no such person shall be entitled to the benefits of this act who shall fail to make entry within two years after the passage thereof: And provided further, That this act shall not be considered as entitling any person to make another homestead entry who shall have received the benefits of the homestead law since being prevented, as aforesaid, from completing title to the lands so settled upon and improved by him.

With the following amendment recommended by the Committee on Public Lands:

In line 16, page 2, strike out the word "December" and insert in lieu thereof the word "February."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask for an explanation of this bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is intended to give relief to certain settlers who entered upon lands claimed by the Manitoba Railroad Company. After contest with the railway company they entered upon it when it had been ascertained that the railway company had no right to it. They claim they made the settlement on the advice of the register and receiver of the local land office, and made large improvements. Some expended as high as a thousand dollars in improvements. It was afterwards discovered that while the railroad company was claiming that land, Bishop Ireland had made a contract with the railroad company for the purchase of the land. They had entered upon the land without knowledge of this contract under the belief that it was clear, because it was clear in fact from the railroad company's claim. But, as Members are aware, there is a statute under which a party making a contract for the purchase of land from a railroad company that afterwards loses its title can secure the land from the Government by paying the Government $1.25 an acre. Bishop Ireland contested the claim of the settlers and secured title from the Government by paying the $1.25 per acre, and that deprived the settlers of the land.

I have always felt that these parties acted in good faith, and having spent a large amount of time and money in complying with the homestead law should have some relief. They have asked that Congress appropriate money for the purpose of paying them for the loss, but, of course, that is contrary to the policy of Congress, and this seemed to me was the only relief possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the relief asked?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It just allows them to enter upon other lands and to get credit for the time spent and for the improvements made upon this land in proving up another homestead. Now, it seems to me that this is a meritorious measure. It was recommended by the Committee on Public Lands and it has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and also of the Commissioner of the Public Land Office.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if this is a special bill—if it relates only to this railroad land that he mentions?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It relates only to this particular land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does it in any way affect the homestead laws of the United States or the public land laws?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not at all. It only affects the particular tracts of land covered by a certain contract held by Bishop Ireland.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many acres of land are involved in this bill?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is hard to determine. The best estimate I can make at present is that it will affect about half a dozen different parties. Some of them entered for as high as 160 acres and others for less.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INSANE ASYLUM, OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13675) to ratify and confirm the acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, passed in the year 1905, relating to an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma, and providing for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma at Fort Supply, in Woodward County, Ind. T., and making appropriations therefor, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, entitled "An act accepting the offer made by Congress to the Territory of Oklahoma, granting to such Territory the use of Fort Supply Military Reservation and the buildings thereon for the purpose of an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma, and providing for the care of the insane of the Territory of Oklahoma," approved March 1, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, in all things ratified, approved, and confirmed, and that section 14 of an act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, entitled "An act making appropriations for current expenses of the Territory of Oklahoma for the years 1905 and 1906, and for deficiency appropriations and for miscellaneous purposes," approved March 11, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, in all things ratified, approved, and confirmed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection. If he understood the bill I am satisfied he would not object to it. I desire to state that this bill has had the approval of Congress heretofore, and also of the legislature of Oklahoma. I do not see why it should be objected to, if it is thoroughly understood.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I understand all about the bill and that is the reason I object to it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move to suspend the rules and pass this bill? If so, I desire to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the matter up with the gentleman later.

COINAGE OF MINOR COINS, ETC.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 229) providing for the purchase of metal and the coinage of minor coins, and the distribution and redemption of said coins, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3528 and 3529 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3528. For the purchase of metal for the minor coinage authorized by this act a sum not exceeding $200,000 in lawful money of the United States shall, upon the recommendation of the Director of the Mint, and in such sums as he may designate, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be transferred to the credit of the superintendents of the mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco, Denver, and New Orleans, at which establishments, until otherwise provided by law, such coinage shall be carried on. The superintendents, with the approval of the Director of the Mint as to price, terms, and quantity, shall purchase the metal required for such coinage by public advertisement, and the lowest and best bid shall be accepted, the fineness of the metals to be determined on the mint assay. The gain arising from the coinage of such metals into coin of a nominal value, exceeding the cost thereof, shall be credited to the special fund denominated the minor-coinage profit fund; and this fund shall be charged with the wastage incurred in such coinage, and with the cost of distributing said coins, as hereinafter provided. The balance remaining to the credit of this fund, and any balance of the profits accrued from minor coinage under former acts, shall be, from time to time, and at least twice a year, covered into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 3529. The minor coins authorized by this act may, at the discretion of the Director of the Mint, be delivered in any of the principal cities and towns of the United States, at the cost of the mints, for transportation, and shall be exchangeable at par at the mints named, at the discretion of the superintendents, for any other coins of copper, bronze, or copper-nickel heretofore authorized, and it shall be lawful for the Treasurer and the several assistant treasurers and depositaries of the United States to redeem, in lawful money, under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, all copper, bronze, and copper-nickel coins authorized by law when presented in sums of not less than $20; and whenever, under this authority, these coins are presented for redemption in such quantity as to show the amount outstanding to be redundant, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to direct that such coinage shall cease until otherwise authorized by him."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask an explanation of just what this bill does.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I can explain in a very few words. This bill relates wholly to what is known as "minor coins"—the 5-cent pieces and the pennies. It has no reference to the coinage of any other coins but those two. Under existing law those coins can only be coined at the Philadelphia mint. The bill provides that such coins may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be coined either at the Philadelphia mint or any of the other three mints provided by law, namely, the Denver mint, the San Francisco mint, and the New Orleans mint.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if that is the only amendment to the present law?

Mr. BONYNGE. No; that is one amendment. I am going to mention the other amendment. Under existing law there is a fund of $50,000 for the coinage of these minor coins. That law was passed in 1873. Since that time, as everybody will understand, there has been a great demand for an increased supply of those minor coins. This bill increases that fund from $50,000 to $200,000. In all other respects the law remains exactly as it is. Those are the only two amendments made by this bill to existing law.

Mr. GARNER. One other question. What committee reported the bill?

Mr. BONYNGE. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and it is a unanimous report of that committee.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] will take their places as tellers.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we not entitled to debate on this subject?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; if a second is ordered, there will be twenty minutes' debate on a side. The gentleman from Colorado will be entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be entitled to twenty minutes.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 117, noes 2.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I care to add anything further to what I have said, and I yield so much of my time as he may desire to the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures [Mr. SOUTHARD].

Mr. PALMER. Before the gentleman sits down I would like to ask if this involves any expense to the Government?

Mr. BONYNGE. It involves the expense of purchasing dies for each of these mints. Otherwise the machinery, I understand, is in all of these mints. That purchase is a very small amount and more than offset by the saving to the Government in the express charges on the coins sent from the Philadelphia mint to various parts of the country where these coins will be required. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint both join in recommending it, for the reason that it will be such a large saving in expense to the Government.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. It is such a bill that has been recommended by every Secretary of the Treasury for a great many years. I know that Secretary Gage recommended it time and again. Secretary Shaw has recommended it in his annual report for several years. Under the law as it now stands $50,000 is set apart as a fund to be used for the purposes of minor coinage, and this $50,000 covers the cost of material in all stages of manufacture. The recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury has been that this fund be increased, and this bill increases the fund from $50,000 to $200,000, not annually, but it provides that a fund of $200,000 be set apart to be used in the coinage of minor coins. I will read the provision of the bill relating to this subject:

> For the purchase of metal for the minor coinage authorized by this act a sum not exceeding $200,000 in lawful money of the United States shall, upon the recommendation of the Director of the Mint, and in such sums as he may designate, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be transferred to the credit of the superintendents of the mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco, Denver, and New Orleans, at which establishments, until otherwise provided by law, such coinage shall be carried on.

It simply provides a sum of $200,000 instead of $50,000 shall be so set apart for this purpose. It contains a provision which makes another amendment, and that is this. Under the law as it now stands coinage of the minor coins—five-cent pieces, nickels—can be carried on at the Philadelphia mint only. There can be no good reason why the other mints should be restricted in this matter. The Secretary of the Treasury says that this restriction ought to be removed, and this bill amends the section so as to remove it. That is all that the bill contains. It is something that ought to be done. It will effect a saving to the Government; it will be for the convenience of the Government; it will contribute to the ready distribution of the minor coins when the manufacture is commenced, and we have been able to see no reason why these sections of the Revised Statutes should not be amended as provided in this bill.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say this to the House, that this is entirely a non-partisan measure. This bill was reported by the unanimous vote of the committee. It is right, I think, and it will be of great convenience to the business public. The Treasury Department approves the bill and the Treasury officials also. Instead of being an expense to the Government, it will actually save money.

Under the present law all minor coins are coined at the mint at Philadelphia. Business development in the West and South has demanded a change, and now the proposition is that some of these minor coins shall be coined at New Orleans and some at Denver and some at San Francisco. The statement is made by these Treasury Department officials that the cost of the shipment of these minor coins when they are coined will be greatly reduced and that business all through the other sections of the country will be greatly facilitated by the passage of this bill, because business men in all sections of the country will be able to get change more easily and more expeditiously.

I think the bill ought to pass without a dissenting vote, and I do not believe that anybody is opposed to it except the Philadelphia people.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to use some of his time.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this is one of those specious bills that on the face of it is presented to the House on the ground of economy. But when you come to look into it you will find that, instead of being in that direction, it is along the idea of forcing this Government to expend more money than is necessary in keeping open and finding work for mints which a few years ago, against the protest of the Members of this House who were best informed on this subject, were kept open. This is nothing but a measure to furnish work at these mints that have been located throughout the country, because if they have not some occupation it will be found that they are useless and not necessary. It is a fact, and this bill is brought in here to furnish some work to these various mints scattered throughout the country, when, in the judgment of those who wish true economy in the coinage of our silver and gold pieces, there is no necessity for the existence of these mints at all.

A few years ago a bill was brought into this House changing the character of those institutions or depositories—I forget the technical term—and making them into mints, and now when it is discovered that there is not sufficient work for them to do they propose to come in here——

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. In a moment. They propose to come in here and change the statute which has been recognized as efficient for the true economic coinage of these pieces in order to make work for these mints which have not enough work to occupy their time. So they propose to distribute the coinage of this silver throughout these various mints. The mint at Philadelphia was constructed by the Government at great expense, with the most improved machinery instituted there for the greatest economy in the coinage of the bullion, and more than that, the most skilled operatives are there also. And on this alleged measure that is brought in here the only plea that has been offered is the express charges on the bullion from the mines to Philadelphia. Whereas, as a matter of fact, the true economy would be to close these mints and let the Philadelphia mint, which now stands idle and the employees waiting outside for occupation, coin this bullion as suggested in the bill. That is the reason for this measure.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Simply assuming now that we are going to keep these mints in operation and not close them up, as the gentleman suggests, what is the objection to this bill?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I am calling the attention of the House to the argument that is being made here as to why the existing law should be changed, and that instead of being in the direction of real economy it is an effort to keep open mints throughout the United States that are not now necessary to coin the average amount of coinage that takes place annually, and the true economy would be to let the statute remain as it is and do the work at the mint over in Philadelphia, where the best facilities, the most skilled operatives are located, and the finest machinery has been installed at the most economical rate, and close these other mints if necessary. It is in the line of true economy, and this bill is nothing in the world but an effort to distribute the work that can be done at Philadelphia. I tell you now, when the operations of that mint are standing idle and the people are not employed because there is not sufficient work, if there is a Member in this House that can take the stand that we should keep the minor factories going, so to speak, while the main factory is able to do the work—if there is a Member of this House that contends that that is economy in the management of this Government, why, then, there will be justification for passing this bill; but if that is not so, a change of the statute is simply trying to perpetuate the situation of keeping in operation these branch mints, for which, in my judgment, and in that of those familiar with the subject, there is not the slightest necessity. Now, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, if he will allow me, if he is apprised of what the expense will be of duly fitting up the Colorado and southern mints for this work?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will say that I believe that it is not contemplated to coin these minor coins at the New Orleans mint. There will be some slight expense in dies, and perhaps other work, in fitting up the Denver and San Francisco mints. But the Secretary of the Treasury says that there will be a saving. It costs more to transport the metal in the shape of coin than it does in its original state. He says there will be a saving under the bill, besides convenience to the Department by broadening out this law and permitting the coinage of the minor coins wherever the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint shall desire to have it done.

Mr. BATES. One other question. Is it not the present practice that the blanks for this nickel coinage are made up at Meriden and other places in Connecticut?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I think the practice is this: The Government buys what are known as "disks," metal disks, and from these metal disks it makes the pennies and 5-cent pieces. I understand (though this may not be authoritative) that the Government proposes in the course of time to manufacture its own disks, and that there will be some saving in getting their metal disks in that way.

Mr. BATES. Well, that being the case, how can it be argued that there will be any saving in the transportation of the disks from the State of Connecticut and have it turned into coins in the city of Philadelphia?

Mr. SOUTHARD. It is entirely possible that these disks may be delivered at some other mint as cheaply as at Philadelphia.

Mr. BATES. As to that now, how can they be delivered in Colorado as cheaply as in Philadelphia, assuming that they can only be manufactured in Connecticut?

Mr. SOUTHARD. What I mean is this: After these disks are made into nickels and pennies they must be distributed all over the country. When the metal is manufactured into coin the charges for transportation after it is manufactured into money are very much greater than the freight on the metal. I stated that at the outset, and we have it from the Secretary of the Treasury that this law will work a saving to the Treasury; that it will be in the interest of economy as well as more convenient for the Treasury. Nobody has thus far offered any objection to this proposed change in the law; nobody has questioned that it will be a saving to the Treasury; nobody has questioned that convenience to the Treasury will result from it.

Mr. BATES. Just one more question, Mr. Speaker. How can you make that statement and how can anyone make that statement until he has investigated and ascertained the expense of the equipment of these other mints for doing this work?

Mr. SOUTHARD. It is fair to assume that the Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury investigated this matter before making their reports year after year, as they have done.

Mr. BATES. Was not the testimony offered before the Committee on Coinage last year at its sessions that it would cost a large amount, some fifty or sixty thousand dollars, to equip them to do this work?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I think not. My recollection is that the testimony was to the effect that the expense would be comparatively trivial.

Mr. BONYNGE. My recollection, if the chairman will permit me, is that it would not exceed a few hundred dollars for each mint. They have all the machinery in each of these mints for the coinage of these minor pieces now, excepting the dies, and they will cost a few hundred dollars each. The saving in cost arises from the fact that you can ship the metal and the dies by freight, and after you coin the metal you ship the coin by express and pay express charges upon coin, which naturally is very much higher than freight upon the metals and freight upon the dies, and the dies themselves would cost, as I understand, only a few hundred dollars for each mint. In every respect all these mints are ready for the coinage of the minor coins with the exception of the dies.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that when that coin is shipped to the different cities of the country it is shipped at the expense of the mint, and that is what makes the cost. Now, in regard to San Francisco, we have a fully equipped mint there—I think as good in machinery and in operatives as the mint at Philadelphia. The mint is not altogether idle. They are working there coining gold coin; but it is a great convenience to the business communities of the cities of the West to have these minor coins coined at that mint. At the present time it frequently happens that there is a shortage in these small coins; there are not enough of them on hand, and then they have to send on to Philadelphia and pay the express charges clear out to San Francisco in order to get a few hundred dollars' worth of nickels.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I understand you to admit that the mint in San Francisco is not working on full time.

Mr. KAHN. It is not working on full time and yet——

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Is it working on half time?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know just how much of a force is there, but the condition there is this: There is quite a force employed; I know that——

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE], if the mint in Denver is working on full time?

Mr. BONYNGE. I can not answer as to that. It was not when I left; but I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that when I left, there were in the vaults of that mint $19,000,000 worth of gold bars ready to be coined into gold coin, and that the mint has just been completed; that it is the latest, the most improved, the best mint in the United States. Being the latest, it naturally has the most improved machinery. It has only recently been completed, the force is now being employed, and when in operation I have no doubt that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] will be clamoring for some work for his Philadelphia mint, because otherwise they will have to close the Philadelphia mint. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. You can not wag a dog by the tail, and in spite of all the enthusiasm and western atmosphere which the gentleman brings here, it is superfluous to attempt to put the mint at Denver or the mint at San Francisco in the same class with the mint at Philadelphia. The gentleman, however, reenforces my argument, for the House will take into consideration the fact that the trouble is, as said by those who protested some years ago against the erection of these new mints, that they were not necessary, and now that fact is proved, because gentlemen ask the passage of a law in order to make work, so that these unnecessary mints may have something to do. I say that with the mint at Philadelphia fully equipped, there is no necessity to change the statute, and it is not true economy to do so. If you want to economize, close the unnecessary mints and let the coinage go on from a true economical standpoint.

Mr. BATES. Has not the director of the Philadelphia mint written a letter stating that this legislation is unnecessary; that it is not a question of the employment of men, but a question of equipment? Does he not state that the dies will have to be purchased with which to coin this subsidiary coin? If you will look into this question, there is not an argument that will stand in favor of this proposition except the argument of local pride and the desire to obtain work for these smaller mints, and this Government ought not to be run on such a basis. It ought to be run on economical principles, and if you have too many mints they should be concentrated.

Mr. BONYNGE. Did I understand the gentleman to say a few minutes ago that the Philadelphia mint is standing idle?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Part of it.

Mr. BONYNGE. Then why not close your Philadelphia mint if you do not need it? [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Simply because it is the best-equipped mint. It is the main mint, and we have the dies with which to coin this subsidiary coinage, which the Denver mint and the California mint have not. It means the expenditure of money to buy the necessary equipment. Dropping the general doctrine that we have too many mints, I will come down to this specific bill. Dies will have to be purchased for the California mint and for the Denver mint before they can coin this subsidiary coinage, and therefore, right on that point, I think this bill should not prevail.

Mr. BONYNGE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BONYNGE. So long as there is no use for the dies at the Philadelphia mint, would the gentleman have any objection to shipping the dies to Denver, where we have the machinery and are able to do the coinage?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I should object. We have the skilled workmen, who are used to this kind of special coinage. We have the workmen, we have got the machinery, and why should the Government change the location of men who are used to doing just this work in order to accommodate Denver and San Francisco?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman state how many operators belonging to the mint have been transferred to the Denver mint?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Oh, you couldn't start your mint in Denver until you got several of the skilled laborers from the Philadelphia mint. Now you have taken the skilled laborers, you want to take the work out of the mouths of the Philadelphia men.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman will admit that the mint in San Francisco has been in operation for many years.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. It has.

Mr. KAHN. And that we have a splendid force of mechanics there.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says so.

Mr. KAHN. Well, that is a fact. The gentleman says, in answer to an inquiry from the gentleman from Colorado, that he would not lend the dies to the Denver mint because they had no skilled mechanics there. Now, we have the skilled mechanics at San Francisco, and will the gentleman be willing to send the dies from the Philadelphia mint to the mint at San Francisco?

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell me anything in rhyme or reason why with the skilled labor at Philadelphia we should send the dies to San Francisco?

Mr. KAHN. Because it would be a saving to the Government.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. It would be no saving to the Government, because they have the dies already in Philadelphia. I have heard of the great cost of the transportation of silver across the country, and you will have to transport these dies.

Mr. KAHN. But the cost of transporting the dies would be very slight, and the cost of transportation of these coins is very great. Besides, the metal out of which the money is made is mined right around California.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman from California that the ideas of everything out in his State are so large that you can't buy anything there less than two bits. Why, I have been there and you can hardly get a drink under two bits, and what does the gentleman need of nickels or 10-cent pieces? [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the only reason why Philadelphia has the exclusive right at the present time to coin nickels is that up to ten or fifteen years ago we had no use for nickels nor for pennies. They were not in common circulation, but we have come down to the standard of the East and we have nickels and we have pennies. We want them; we need them, and we can not now get them without having to send to Philadelphia for them. Now, we want to coin them out there where we have a splendid equipment, and thus save the Government the expense of bringing them from Philadelphia.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That is what I call penny wise and pound foolish. [Laughter.] The gentleman wants to keep unnecessary mints open to coin pennies when we could save pounds to the Government by closing them.

Mr. KAHN. The trouble with Philadelphia is that she is so slow we can't get the nickels out there in time. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. That is the fault of the western railroads; we can ship them all right but your prairie-schooner railroads are so slow you can't get them out there in time; that is the misfortune of California. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

Mr. BONYNGE. I will yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania one minute if I have the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not certain that I understood the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I think I did, but I want to ask him if it is not about this: That it is contrary to the fundamental principles of the Republican party to give employment to labor in the mints at Denver or San Francisco and New Orleans if there is any danger of somebody having less employment in Philadelphia? [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is trying to inject the old silver question into this debate. [Laughter.] He must wake up some issue that is not dead. [Renewed laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 956) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the district of Alaska, and I also ask unanimous consent that the substitute may be read in lieu of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report, and further asks unanimous consent that the substitute may be read in lieu of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. The consent is only to be given to read the substitute?

The SPEAKER. Yes. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska.

Be it enacted, etc., That the people of the Territory of Alaska shall be represented by a Delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States, chosen by the people thereof in the manner and at the time hereinafter prescribed, and who shall be known as the Delegate from Alaska. Such Delegate, when duly chosen and qualified shall possess the same powers and privileges and be entitled to the same rate of compensation as the Delegates in the House of Representatives from the Territories of the United States: Provided, however, That such Delegate, in lieu of all other allowances, shall, in addition to his salary, receive the sum of $1,500 per annum, which shall cover all mileage and other expenses except stationery allowance and compensation for clerk hire.

SEC. 2. That no person shall be a Delegate who shall not at the time of his election have attained the age of 25 years and have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and be a bona fide resident, and an elector as prescribed in this act, of the Territory of Alaska.

SEC. 3. That the first election for Delegate from Alaska shall be held upon the second Tuesday of August, in the year 1906, and that at said first election there shall be elected a Delegate who shall hold his office for the unexpired portion of the Fifty-ninth Congress, which term of office is hereinafter designated as the "short term;" and also at said first election there shall be elected a Delegate who shall hold his office for the full term of the Sixtieth Congress, which term of office is hereinafter designated as the "long term."

That the Delegate chosen at said first election for the short term shall hold his office from the date of his election certificate during the remainder of the Fifty-ninth Congress; and the Delegate chosen at said first election for the long term shall hold his office for the full term of the Sixtieth Congress; that the Delegate chosen at each subsequent election shall hold his office for the same term as the Members of the House of Representatives chosen at the general election in the same year.

That the salary and allowances of the Delegate chosen for the short term at said first election shall begin with the date of his election certificate, and shall extend throughout and until the close of the Fifty-ninth Congress. The salary and allowances of the Delegate chosen for the long term at said first election shall begin at the commencement of the term of the Sixtieth Congress and extend throughout and until the close thereof. The salary and allowances of the Delegate chosen at each subsequent election shall be for the full term of the Congress to which he is elected a Delegate.

SEC. 4. That all male citizens of the United States 21 years of age and over who are actual and bona fide residents of Alaska and who have been such residents during the entire year immediately preceding the election, and who have been residents in the precinct in which they vote for thirty days next preceding the election, shall be qualified to vote for the election of a Delegate from Alaska.

SEC. 5. That each incorporated town now existing or hereafter organized in Alaska shall, when the population of the same is less than 2,000 inhabitants, constitute one voting precinct. That the common council of each incorporated town may, when the population of the same is 2,000 or more, divide the same into two or more voting precincts: Provided, however, That any action of said common council changing old or creating new voting precincts in said town shall be taken at least sixty days prior to the date of the holding of the next election under this act.

That the common council of each incorporated town, at least thirty days prior to the date of the holding of each election under this act, shall select and provide a polling place for each voting precinct in said town, and shall give notice of said approaching election by posting a copy of said notice in at least three conspicuous public places in said town, and whenever there are one or more newspapers of general circulation published in said town, then a copy of said notice shall also be published in one or more of such newspapers at least thirty days prior to the date of the election; and said notice, among other things, shall specify the date of said election, the location of said polling place or polling places, and the hours between which the same will be open; and not less than ten days before the date of such election the common council shall appoint from among the qualified electors of said town three judges of election for each voting precinct in said town, all of whom shall reside in the voting precinct where they are appointed to serve, and no more than two of whom in any one voting precinct shall be of the same political party; that the name of each voting precinct comprising one incorporated town shall be the same as the name of said town; when more than one voting precinct is created in an incorporated town the said precincts shall be given the name of said town and numbered consecutively. For example: "Nome City, voting precinct No. 1," and "Nome City, voting precinct No. 2," and so forth.

SEC. 6. That all of the territory in each commissioner's precinct which now exists, or which may hereafter be created, in Alaska, lying outside of an incorporated town, shall, for the purposes of this act, constitute one election district; that in each year in which a Delegate is to be elected the commissioner in each election district (at least thirty days before the date of said first election and at least sixty days before the date of each subsequent election) shall issue a joint order and notice, signed by him and entered in his records in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, in which said joint order and notice he shall—

First. Divide his election district into such number of voting precincts as may, in his judgment, be necessary or convenient, defining the boundaries of each precinct by natural objects and permanent monuments or landmarks, as far as practicable, and in such manner that the boundaries of each can be readily determined and become generally known from such description, specify a polling place in each of said precincts, and give to each voting precinct an appropriate name by which the same shall thereafter be designated: Provided, however, That no such voting precinct shall be established with less than thirty qualified voters resident therein; that the precincts established as aforesaid shall remain as permanent precincts for all subsequent elections, unless discontinued or changed by order of the commissioner of that district.

Second. Give notice of said approaching election, specifying in said notice, among other things, the date of such election, the boundaries of said voting precincts as established, the location of the polling place in each precinct, and the hours between which said polling places will be open.

Said joint order and notice shall be given publicity by said commissioner by posting copies of the same (at least twenty days before the date of said first election and at least thirty days before the date of each subsequent election). Said copies shall be posted as follows: One at the office of the commissioner in said district, and three copies to be posted in three conspicuous public places in each of said voting precincts as established, one of which shall be the designated polling place in each precinct; and said commissioner shall also mail a certified copy of said joint order and notice to the governor of Alaska at his official residence.

Prior to the date of the holding of such election said commissioner shall select, notify, and appoint from among the qualified electors in said voting precincts three judges of election for each of said precincts, no more than two of whom shall be of the same political party. Said commissioner shall notify all of said judges of election of their appointment as such, so that each and all of them shall receive said notice at least ten days before the date of the election.

SEC. 7. That the three judges of election in each voting precinct shall constitute and shall be known and designated as the election board for said precinct. That the election board in each precinct, or a majority of the members of said board, shall have authority, and it shall be their duty to provide a suitable ballot box and prepare the polling place for the holding of said election.

That the members of said election board in each precinct, before entering upon the duties of their office, shall each severally take an oath, which shall be reduced to writing, before an officer qualified to administer oaths, to honestly, faithfully, and promptly perform the duties of their positions; and if no officer qualified to administer oaths be present or available, then any one of said duly appointed or selected judges of election may administer the necessary oath to said other two judges, and he shall afterwards in turn be sworn by one of them.

That each of said judges shall have authority to administer any oath to the voter necessary or proper under this act, and said judges shall have equal authority; and in case of any question or disagreement over any matter during the course of said election the decision of the majority of said judges shall govern.

Two of the three judges of election in each voting precinct shall also perform the duties of clerks of election for that said precinct; the two judges performing the duties of clerks shall be of different political parties; it shall be the duty of each of said clerks to make a full written record of such election as held in that said precinct, and each of them shall keep a correct duplicate register and enter therein the names of the voters and the fact that they have voted, or have offered to vote and were refused, and a brief statement of the reasons for said refusal.

SEC. 8. That each of the candidates for the office of Delegate herein provided for, at any election held hereunder, shall be entitled to one watcher at each voting precinct, who shall be permitted to be present within the place of voting at such precinct, and in some place therein where he may at all times be in full view of every act done. Such watcher shall have the right to be so present at all times from the opening of the polls until the ballots are finally counted and the result certified by the election board. Each watcher shall be required to present to the election board proper credentials, signed by the candidate he represents, showing him to be the duly authorized watcher for such person.

SEC. 9. That in case any of the judges of election selected as herein provided for any precinct shall fail to appear and qualify at the time and place designated for the election for which they shall be appointed, then, in that event, the qualified voters present may, by a majority viva voce vote, select a suitable person or persons to fill the vacancy or vacancies in said election board; and the person or persons so selected shall qualify and serve on said election board, with the same powers and in the same manner as if appointed as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 10. That the election boards herein provided for shall keep the several polling places open for the reception of votes from 8 o'clock antemeridian until 7 o'clock postmeridian on the day of election. The voting at said election shall be by secret printed or written ballot. The ballot at said first election shall be substantially in the following form:

"For Delegate from Alaska.

"For the short term (here insert the name of the person voted for).

"For the long term (here insert the name of the person voted for)."

At all elections after said first election the ballot shall be substantially in the following form:

"For Delegate from Alaska.

"(Here insert the name of the person voted for.)"

Such ballot shall be folded by the voter so as not to disclose the vote, and by him handed to any one of the judges of election, who shall immediately, in the presence of the voter and of all the members of the election board, deposit the same, folded as aforesaid, in the ballot box, where the same shall remain untouched until the polls are closed. At the time the ballot is so deposited the two judges of election performing the duties of clerks shall each of them enter in his duplicate register the name of the voter and the fact that he has voted.

SEC. 11. That any person offering to vote may be challenged by any election officer or any other person entitled to vote at the same polling place, or by any duly appointed watcher, and when so challenged, before being allowed to vote he shall make and subscribe to the following oath: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that you are 21 years of age and a citizen of the United States; that you are an actual and bona fide resident of Alaska, and have been such resident during the entire year immediately preceding this election, and have been a resident in this voting precinct for thirty days next preceding this election, and that you have not voted at this election," and further naming the place from which the voter came immediately prior to living in the precinct in which he offers to vote, and giving the length of time of his residence in the former place. And upon the voter swearing to such an affidavit he shall be allowed to vote; but if any person so challenged shall refuse or fail to take such oath and sign such affidavit, then his vote shall be rejected; and any person swearing falsely in any such affidavit shall be guilty of perjury and shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer punishment as is prescribed by law for persons guilty of perjury.

SEC. 12. That the election boards herein provided at each polling place, as soon as the polls are closed, shall immediately publicly proceed to open the ballot box and count and canvass the votes cast, and they shall thereupon, under their hands and seals, make out in duplicate a certificate of the result of said election, specifying the number of votes, in words and figures, cast for each candidate, and they shall then immediately carefully and securely seal up in one envelope one of said duplicate certificates and one of the registers of voters and all the ballots cast, and mail such envelope, with said papers inclosed, at the nearest post-office (by registered mail, if possible), duly addressed to the governor of Alaska at his place of residence, with the postage prepaid thereon.

The other duplicate certificate and register of voters, with the oaths of the judges of election, and any and all affidavits made by challenged voters or in relation thereto, the judges of election shall at once seal up in an envelope addressed to the clerk of the district court for the division in which the precinct is situate, at his place of residence, with the postage thereon prepaid (by registered mail, if possible), and deposit the same in the nearest post-office.

The clerk of the court in each of the divisions of Alaska shall compile the returns received from the various polling places as soon as the same are received, ascertain the result, transmit such compilation and result duly authenticated, to the governor of Alaska at his place of residence.

The clerks of the district court for the various divisions of Alaska and the governor of Alaska shall each retain and carefully preserve all such documents received by them until the end of the term for which the Delegate chosen has been elected.

SEC. 13. That the respective clerks of the court shall make return, as hereinbefore provided, to the governor so that he shall receive the same not later than the third Tuesday of October next succeeding the election.

SEC. 14. That the governor, the surveyor-general, and ex officio secretary of the Territory of Alaska, and the collector of customs for Alaska shall constitute a canvassing board for the Territory of Alaska to canvass and compile in writing the vote specified in the certificates of election returned to the governor from all the several election precincts as aforesaid.

The said canvassing board shall commence the performance of its duties at the office of the governor within ten days after the third Tuesday of October in each year in which an election is held under and by virtue of this act, and shall continue with such work from day to day until the same is completed; and said canvass shall be publicly made.

In case it shall appear to said board that no election return as hereinbefore prescribed has been received by the governor from any precinct in which an election has been held, the said board may accept in place thereof the certificate of election for such precinct received from the clerk of the court, and may canvass and compile the same with the other election returns.

Said board, upon the completion of said canvass, shall declare the person who has received the greatest number of votes for Delegate to be the duly elected Delegate from Alaska for the term for which he has been so elected, and shall issue and deliver to him in writing under their hands and seals a certificate of his election.

The said canvassing board may employ a clerk to aid them in their work at a compensation not to exceed $5 per day. The compensation of such clerk shall be paid by the governor out of his contingent fund.

SEC. 15. That each newspaper in Alaska officially authorized to publish any notice of election provided for herein shall be entitled to receive therefor not more than $10 for the publication of the notice of any one election; that each commissioner in the Territory of Alaska is authorized to contract for the proper posting of all election notices, as provided herein, in each voting precinct created in his said election district, and that not more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed at each election for the posting of said notices in any one voting precinct in Alaska; that not more than $10 at each election shall be allowed for the rental of a proper polling place in each voting precinct in Alaska; that each of the judges of election who shall qualify and serve as such in any precinct on said election day shall be entitled to a compensation of $5 per day for said one day's service.

SEC. 16. That the compensation for said newspaper publications, the proper posting of said notices, the rental of said polling place, the fees of the judges of election in each precinct, together with the cost of securing a ballot box and the cost of necessary postage and stationery, shall be certified with proper vouchers and receipts attached by the various election officials to the judge of the district court in the said judicial division in which said voting precinct is situate, and the same shall be audited by said judge and shall be paid by the clerk of the court of said division out of the same fund and in the same manner as the incidental expenses of said district court are paid.

SEC. 17. That any person who, by any means, shall hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct any other person from qualifying himself to vote or from lawfully voting at any election herein provided for, or who shall knowingly personate and vote or attempt to vote in the name of any other person, or who shall vote more than once at the same election, or shall vote at a place where or at a time when he may not lawfully be entitled to vote, or shall do any unlawful act to secure an opportunity to vote for himself or for any other person, or who, by or through any force, threat, intimidation, bribery, reward or offer thereof, unlawfully vote himself or procures another to vote, or prevents or induces another to refrain from exercising his right of suffrage, or induces by any such means any officer of an election to do any unlawful act or omit to do his duty in any manner, or who, directly or indirectly, in any manner shall fraudulently change or cause to be changed the returns or the true and lawful result of any election hereunder, or shall attempt to do the same, or who shall delay, cause to be delayed, or connive at the delay of election returns in any manner, or attempt to do so, shall be guilty of a crime, and upon the conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 nor less than $100, or imprisoned not more than three years, or both, and pay the costs of the prosecution; and it is further provided that every officer of an election held hereunder who neglects to perform or violates any duty imposed upon him as such officer, or knowingly does any unauthorized act with the intent to affect the election or the result thereof, or who shall permit, make, or connive at any false count or certificate of election, or who shall conceal, withhold, destroy, or willfully delay the returns of election, or connive at the same being done, or who shall aid, counsel, or procure any person to do or attempt to do any act made a crime hereinbefore, or shall attempt to do any of the acts hereinbefore mentioned, shall be guilty of a crime, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or by both, and shall pay all costs of the prosecution; and jurisdiction of all such matters is hereby conferred upon the district court of Alaska.

SEC. 18. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the district court of Alaska to hear and determine all controversies, legal and equitable, that may arise out of any election held under the provisions of this act, regulated by the general pleading and practice of said court.

SEC. 19. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are to that extent repealed. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has just reported?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill provides for a Delegate from the Territory or district of Alaska. It is almost in exact terms with the bill that passed the last Congress. It passed this House without opposition. It is not my purpose at this moment to go into the details of the bill, but I will yield for the present such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN].

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill which we have before us now is a bill to give to the Territory of Alaska an elective Delegate upon the floor of the House of Representatives. The number of the pending bill is Senate bill 956, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session. It will be observed, however, that the House Committee on Territories in making their report upon Senate bill 956 struck out the Senate bill and inserted a substitute bill in its place, and it is this substitue bill—which still retains the number of Senate bill 956—that we are now to consider.

Now, I do not propose to-day, when many important matters are pressing upon the attention of this House, to detain the Members for any great length of time in making a general speech upon Alaska. I wish to confine my few remarks almost entirely to the provisions of this bill which we are now to consider, and which I certainly hope we will pass.

I consider it my duty at the outset to pay a tribute of respect to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK] who was the pioneer Member of this House years and years ago to begin the good work in the line of preparing a bill to give to Alaska a Delegate in Congress. His work in this matter has been, I conceive, the greatest single aid that this proposition has received from any source. I also wish to say that my friend from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and my friend from Maine [Mr. POWERS] and my friend from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], the chairman of the House Committee on Territories, as well as all the other members of the Territorial Committee of this House, are entitled to great credit for the hard work they have done in this matter, as well as congratulations for the bill which they have all helped to frame, and which is now before this House for action.

Perhaps I should not refer to the lawmaking body at the other end of this Capitol, but at the risk of violating the rules of the House I wish to say that the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has been one of the great champions of legislation which should give to Alaska an elective Delegate in the House of Representatives.. Senator NELSON has contributed many of the very best features to this bill which we have reported to this body. I have said this much in order to show that, while I am taking a great interest in this important matter, that I am not claiming nor seeking to claim any exclusive credit for the good work that has been done in this matter.

I wish to state to this House, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has already stated, that this bill now under discussion is substantially similar to bills which have heretofore passed this House. We passed one bill in the Fifty-seventh Congress and another in the Fifty-eighth Congress, both designed to give Alaska an elective Delegate on the floor of this House, but they failed to pass the Senate. The passage of a bill of this character was recommended by the President in his last annual message to Congress, under date of December 4, 1905, wherein the President said:

> I earnestly ask that Alaska be given an elective Delegate. Some person should be chosen who can speak with authority of the needs of the Territory. * * * In my last two messages I advocated certain additional action on behalf of Alaska. I shall not now repeat those recommendations, but I lay all my stress upon the one recommendation of giving to Alaska some one authorized to speak for it. I should prefer that the Delegate was made elective; but if this be not deemed wise, then make him appointive. At any rate, give Alaska some person whose business it shall be to speak with authority on her behalf in Congress.

I might also add that the last Alaska territorial convention, which was in session during the month of November, 1905, among other resolutions passed one demanding elective representation in the House of Representatives in the following language:

> We demand the application to Alaska of the fundamental American principle of self-government and elective representation in Congress.

From what I have already said it will be seen that the House of Representatives has already twice heretofore declared that in its judgment Alaska was entitled to a Delegate. The President has strongly recommended it, and the people of Alaska are clamoring for it. All reasons seem to exist why we should pass some such bill as this. Therefore, I shall not waste any more time defending the proposition embodied in this bill, but will pass to a brief statement of what this bill contains.

The sole purpose of this bill is to give to Alaska an elective Delegate in this House, and this bill is just as brief as it can possibly be to provide the suitable election machinery to bring about this result.

This House has just listened to a full and complete reading of the bill. But in addition to that reading of the bill I now desire to state in the most brief and concise form just what this bill provides.

The bill provides in substance as follows:

First. Alaska shall be entitled to a Delegate on the floor of the House of Representatives, possessing like powers and with like duties as other Delegates. His salary is fixed at $5,000 per year, and he is allowed $1,500 per annum in lieu of all mileage and other expenses, except stationery allowance and clerk hire.

Second. This bill provides that said Delegate shall be elected by the votes of the people in Alaska, and not for an appointive Delegate.

Third. This bill provides that at said first election in Alaska (in the summer of 1906) there shall be a Delegate elected for a short term, and a Delegate elected for a long term. That the Delegate elected for the short term shall hold his office during the remainder of the term of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and the Delegate elected for the long term shall hold his office during the full term of the Sixtieth Congress. That each Delegate thereafter elected shall hold his office for the same term as the Members of the House of Representatives chosen at the general election in the same year.

Fourth. This bill provides that the first election in Alaska for Delegate shall be held on the second Tuesday in August (1906), and succeeding elections on the second Tuesday in August every two years thereafter.

Fifth. That the qualifications for Delegate from Alaska shall be: Twenty-five years of age, have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and shall be a bona fide resident and elector in Alaska.

Sixth. That in order to vote for said Delegate a person shall be a male citizen of the United States, 21 years of age or over, and an actual bona fide resident of Alaska, and have been such resident of Alaska during the entire year immediately preceding the election, and have resided for the thirty days next preceding election in the voting precinct in which he offers to vote.

Seventh. Each incorporated town in Alaska is made one voting precinct (with the provision that the larger towns may be divided into two or more voting precincts), and the remaining territory outside of the incorporated towns is laid out into voting precincts by the commissioners of Alaska.

Eighth. This bill provides for the giving of due notice of said elections, and the selection of polling places, and the appointment of election boards of a nonpartisan character; provides that the ballot shall be a secret written or printed ballot; that a plurality of votes, and not a majority, shall elect; provides for making returns of said election to the governor and the clerks of the court, and that a canvassing board consisting of the governor, the secretary, and the collector of customs of the Territory shall make canvass of the returns and make certificate of election.

Ninth. This bill provides as good safeguards against fraud and cheating in elections as is possible.

Tenth. This bill provides that the cost of said election shall be paid by the United States out of the court funds of the three judicial divisions of Alaska, and places certain limitations and safeguards about the cost of the election in order that the cost of said election may not be excessive or unreasonable.

Eleventh. This bill provides that instead of the usual allowance for mileage the Delegate shall receive a lump sum of $1,500, which shall cover all mileage and other expenses except stationery allowance and compensation for clerk hire.

When a bill similar to this was under consideration in this House in the last Congress (the Fifty-eighth Congress), the question was raised that the cost of any election for Delegate in Alaska would necessarily be very large. Now, I have gone over this matter of expense at some length and with some care to try and determine just about what the cost of an election would be. My conclusions in relation to the cost of this election are based upon a number of matters. The principal question to determine was approximately how many voting precincts will there be in Alaska. I have figured out that there would probably be about 136 voting precincts in Alaska at the first election. My judgment in this matter is based upon the following statements, which I will incorporate into the RECORD.

The following is a list of the incorporated towns in Alaska, as taken from the report of the governor of Alaska for the year of 1905 (p. 58):

| Name of town. | Date of incorporation. | Name of town. | Date of incorporation. |

COST OF ELECTION IN ALASKA.

The cost of an election in Alaska can not be figured out to a mathematical certainty in advance, but the cost of an election held in Alaska under the provisions of this bill can be readily judged by the following showing or statement:

Probable voting precincts in Alaska.

|---|---|
| In first judicial division | 19 |
| In second judicial division | 46 |
| In third judicial division | 71 |
| Total | 136 |

Cost of election in each precinct is as follows:

|---|---|
| Newspaper publication of notice | $10 |
| Posting notices of election | 10 |
| Rental of polling place | 10 |
| Three judges of election, at $5 per day each | 15 |
| Ballot box, postage, stationery, and miscellaneous | 5 |
| Total cost per precinct | 50 |

Voting precincts, 136; cost per precinct, $50; cost of election, $6,800.

In reality the cost of election under this bill does not even reach this amount of $6,800, for the reason that there would only be newspaper notices published in perhaps about twenty voting precincts. Therefore in about 116 voting precincts where no newspaper notice was published there would be no ten-dollar publication fee. This would cause a reduction in the above estimate of $1,160, subtracted from $6,800, would leave the amount at $5,640.

I conceive that it might be an interesting contribution to this subject under discussion if I would include in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a brief history or statement in relation to the various bills which have heretofore been introduced in Congress, having for their purpose the giving to Alaska of a Delegate or representative of some character here in Washington City.

HISTORY OF ALASKA DELEGATE BILLS.

A bill to provide a Delegate for Alaska was reported from the Committee on Territories of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-third Congress near its close, but too late for action on the same; another similar bill was reported in the Fifty-fourth Congress, which for some reason failed to secure consideration in the House. A third time, in the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, a similar bill was introduced and unanimously reported by the Committee on Territories to the House, but that bill, on account of the press of business during the close of that session, failed of consideration by the House.

During the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress the House Committee on Territories favorably reported a bill for an elective Delegate from Alaska to the House of Representatives. This bill, which was favorably reported, was H. R. 9865, and the report No. 434, both of the Fifty-seventh Congress, first session. The bill was reported so late in the session that it was found impossible to consider it before adjournment. The bill remained on the Calendar of the House, however, and was taken up for consideration during the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress.

In the meantime the Committee on Territories having received further information pertaining to the subject, at that time moved on the floor of the House to substitute a different bill. Accordingly H. R. 16653 was substituted for H. R. 9865, and the substitute bill passed the House on January 23, 1903, second session Fifty-seventh Congress. However, that bill failed to pass the Senate.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress H. R. 13356, a bill to give Alaska an elective Delegate, was favorably reported by the House Committee on Territories on March 2, 1904, Report No. 1300, and said bill was considered in the House and passed on April 25, 1904. This bill was reported on by the Senate Committee on Territories on February 25, 1905, Senate Report No. 4350, but said bill failed to pass the Senate. Also in the Fifty-eighth Congress Senate bill 3339 was introduced in the Senate providing for an elective Delegate for Alaska, and was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Territories on March 1, 1904 (S. Rep. 1176), but failed to pass the Senate.

Therefore in this, the Fifty-ninth Congress, we still find that Alaska is without a Delegate.

Senate bill 956, Fifty-ninth Congress, to give Alaska an elective Delegate, was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Territories (S. Rep. 400) and passed the Senate on February 1, 1906. This bill is now S. 956 and is the bill which the House Committee on Territories herewith report upon, but strike out all of the same after the enacting clause and present herewith a substitute bill.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The cost of this election is paid by their own taxation, is it not—not out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that the costs of these elections held in Alaska under the provisions of this bill "shall be paid by the clerks of the court of Alaska out of the same fund and in the same manner as the incidental expenses of said district court are paid." Now, Congress each year in the sundry civil appropriation bill appropriates a lump sum of money for the expenses of all the United States courts, including those in Alaska. Therefore, upon first blush it would seem that the expense of these elections is paid directly out of the United States Treasury. There is no general Territorial treasury in Alaska. They have no Territorial fund in Alaska out of which these election expenses can be paid. But under the provisions of the Alaska Criminal Code, which Congress passed, and which is operative upon the Alaska people, they are obliged each year to pay thousands and thousands of dollars for licenses—that is, occupation taxes. Every man who runs a drug store or a boarding house, a bank, or an abstract office in Alaska has to pay a tax for the privilege of running the same. The total amount of these taxes paid each year by the residents of Alaska is very large. Now, these taxes for several years went directly into the United States Treasury and not into any Alaskan treasury nor for the benefit of any Alaskan project. Therefore—as I figure it, at least—we have a very considerable amount of money yet in the United States Treasury which justly belongs to the Alaska people. I believe it to be both just and proper that the cost of these elections should be paid in the manner in which we have provided in this bill; indeed, there is no other possible way of paying the cost of these elections.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. WACHTER. What system of voting do you prescribe in this bill—the Australian ballot system?

Mr. CUSHMAN. No. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that it appeared to me—and also to the members of the House Committee on Territories—that to attempt to provide any such elaborate and complicated election machinery as the Australian ballot system for that far-off and sparsely settled region would practically defeat the operation of the law when enacted. We provide in this bill that the voting shall be by secret printed or written ballot, the ballot to be in very simple form—in fact the simplest form possible, as follows:

For Delegate from Alaska.

For the short term, ——— ———.
For the long term, ——— ———.

Then the voter simply writes in the name of the person he desires to vote for. One of the main objects I have kept continually before me in this matter was to try and make all the election machinery, including the ballot, as simple as possible.

Mr. WACHTER. How many judges constitute the returning board of elections?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I may say that that was one of the matters that we considered at some length, and we concluded that an election board in each voting precinct of three members would be the best kind of an election board for that region. Therefore we provided in this bill for an election board of three members in each voting precinct, no more than two of whom shall belong to one political party. A nonpartisan election board.

Mr. WACHTER. Is that nonpartisan—three members, two of whom belong to one political party? You will not get unbiased elections in that way.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Why, certainly. An election board of three members, of which board only two members belong to one party, is a nonpartisan election board. The principle would be just the same if the board consisted of five members, and three of them belonged to one political party and the other two belonged to another political party. The underlying principle is the same. The small number constituting the board does not change the principle. I should like to ask the gentleman from Maryland why he thinks we will not get an unbiased election with this kind of an election board?

Mr. WACHTER. Because from my experience in elections in Maryland I know it can not be done. Human nature has not reached that stage of perfection yet.

Mr. CUSHMAN. No; not in Maryland. [Laughter.]

Mr. WACHTER. Not in Alaska, or in the State of Washington, either.

Mr. HINSHAW. What arrangement does this bill make as a limitation or delimitation of election districts? Are there any means prescribed by which the line of boundaries of these voting precincts can be determined?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Let me explain that matter a little, so I think all can readily understand it. I tried to draw a bill which would give the vast majority of the people who reside in Alaska an opportunity to vote. There are some vast stretches of country in Alaska in which there are no residents. It was not necessary that this bill should be drawn so as to cover every inch of territory in Alaska, even if it was not inhabited.

Now, in Alaska wherever there is any considerable number of people the judges of the district court of Alaska appoint officials who are called "court commissioners." The judge lays out a strip of territory for each commissioner, and this strip of territory is called a "commissioner's district." Now, this bill of ours is drawn to cover all of these commissioner's districts in Alaska. Now, inasmuch as there is a commissioner located wherever there is any considerable number of people in Alaska, and as our bill covers all of these commissioner's districts, therefore this bill covers practically all the inhabited territory in Alaska. Now, under the provisions of this bill each one of these commissioners is authorized and directed, before each election, to divide all the territory in his district "into such number of voting precincts as may, in his judgment, be necessary or convenient, defining the boundaries of each voting precinct by natural objects and permanent monuments or landmarks, as far as practicable, and in such manner that the boundaries of each can be readily determined and become generally known from such description, etc."

Mr. HINSHAW. And is the place of voting specified?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes. Each court commissioner is required by this bill at the same time he divides his district into voting precincts to specify a polling place in each of said voting precincts.

There are at present, I believe, about 51 of these court commissioners located in Alaska, and I shall ask permission to insert with my remarks a list of the same.

THE CENSUS OF ALASKA.

It will be readily understood that the taking of any census in Alaska is a very difficult proposition, and any results obtained therefrom can not, by the very nature of things, be very full or accurate. But I will insert herewith a few figures that I have gleaned from the census taken in Alaska in the summer of 1900 by the Director of the United States Census:

|---|---|
| Total population of Alaska | 63,592 |
| Total white population | 30,507 |
| Total Indian population | 29,536 |
| Total all others, including negroes, Chinese, and Japanese | 3,594 |
| Total males in Alaska 21 years of age and over | 37,956 |
| Total white males in Alaska 21 years of age and over | 25,966 |
| White males over 21 years (literate) | 25,382 |
| White males over 21 years (illiterate) | 584 |

There has unquestionably been a large increase in the white population in Alaska since then. Considering the fact that that census was not in any sense complete, and also the fact that there has been a large increase of population since then, the claim that there are now 70,000 white people in Alaska is not unreasonable. This is the claim which Alaskans make, and, in my opinion, it is not far from right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me say: This bill may not be perfect. I presume it is not. But we who have had this matter in charge have worked hard upon it and given it our best thought. Personally, I may say I have worked for six years upon this matter of trying to secure a Delegate for Alaska. I hope this bill will pass and become a law. I thank you all for your attention, and I now yield back the floor to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-seventh Congress we passed a bill along the same lines as this particular bill, and also in the Fifty-eighth Congress. Both bills failed in the Senate. I am gratified to see that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] presented a bill to the Senate in this Congress covering substantially the features of the House bill of the last Congress, and that bill now comes to us from the Senate after having passed that body. The two House bills in the two previous Congresses died in the Senate. The two bills, the one that is reported as a substitute for the Senate bill and the bill as it came from the Senate, are very much alike. There are, however, two material differences in the two bills. The Senate bill by some oversight, it being the same bill introduced in the last Congress, omitted the long term, and by the way the bill came to the House, if we passed it in that form, we would have had an election next August, when a man would have been elected for the unexpired term of the Fifty-ninth Congress, but nobody would have been elected for the Sixtieth Congress. This substitute bill provides for this oversight, and that there shall be two men elected or one man elected for both terms.

There is another difference between the two bills. The Senate bill provides that the election precincts shall be designated by the judges. The House bill in the substitute provides the precincts shall be set apart by the commissioners. The House bill's proposition, in my judgment, is much better than the Senate in that respect for this reason: Take the Fairbanks judicial district. The judge of that district lives at Fairbanks. The Aleutian Islands are in that district. It will take months to communicate between the Aleutian Islands and Fairbanks so as to set apart the election districts or precincts in those Islands, but the commissioner lives in the vicinity and can readily do this. It is merely a matter of detail and is along the lines of the Senate bill, and these two modifications are the only material differences from the Senate bill. In a recent trip through Alaska, going down the Yukon, passing through the country from one end of it to the other, I found a general demand at every point for some representation in this House.

The people there have been desiring representation for many years, and we have been compelled heretofore to listen to men who have come from that country at their own expense or at the expense of local boards of trade, representing different cities, and really representing special interests. A Delegate from Alaska would enable us to get light upon the needs of every part of that Territory. I trust that the substitute will pass.

No Territory needs representation in Congress more than the great Alaskan country. It has a great future, and the people there should have an opportunity to voice their needs on the floor of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the House amendment to the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE BETWEEN FORT SNELLING RESERVATION AND ST. PAUL.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8103.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what the subject-matter of that bill is.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. A bridge bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8103) to authorize the construction of a bridge between Fort Snelling Reservation and St. Paul, Minn.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I desire to have an opportunity to make some remarks relative to this bill. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the rules be suspended and the bill be put upon its passage, and that, by unanimous consent, a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill comes up under unanimous consent. This is not to suspend the rules, and without objection time could be given for discussion.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That will do just as well. I want fifteen minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for one hour, and can yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD.]

However, the bill has not yet been reported. The Clerk will report the bill with amendments.

The bill and committee amendments were read at length.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River between Fort Snelling Military Reservation, the property of the United States, and St. Paul, Minn., to take the place of a bridge which was constructed under an act of Congress of 1878, the expense being then paid jointly by the United States and the county of Ramsey, of which the greater part is the city of St. Paul. The bridge has been practically condemned by two boards of officers, a board of engineers, a board of military officers, and other officials. The Assistant Secretary of War, General Oliver, the Chief of Staff, General Chaffee, and the Quartermaster-General, General Humphrey, of the Army, have personally visited Fort Snelling and inspected and investigated this bridge and all conditions surrounding it, and all strongly recommend the replacement of the bridge by a new structure and the passing of this bill. The bridge is to be paid for one-half by the city of St. Paul and the street railway company which is given a right across the bridge and one-half by the United States Government. The approaches, abutments, piers, and everything like that are to be donated by the county of Ramsey to the United States, so that the Government itself will have considerably less expense by reason of acquiring such property. The total limit of cost to the United States Government fixed by this bill is at the maximum $125,000. The bill provides that preliminary to any construction the city of St. Paul shall pay its share of $100,000 and the street railway company $25,000 in cash into the Treasury of the United States. Then the United States will be liable for the remainder of the expense, not to exceed the sum of $125,000.

The bill is unanimously reported as to its navigation features by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and as to the features of military necessity by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I wanted to ask the gentleman, before he proceeded, when this report was returned to the House from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think the report shows. It was on the 6th of January.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Did the Military Committee make a report on it also?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes, sir. They made a report dated the 24th of February.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is one of those remarkable days that periodically occur in the halls of the Federal Legislature.

I do not know much about this bill. I apprehend it is a meritorious measure and should be enacted into a law. I did not arise to oppose the measure because of any defect in it. My purpose is to protest against this method of legislation. This, sir, is a day that has been and is to be devoted entirely to the consideration of the Speaker's bills. This whole day is to be taken up, Mr. Speaker, by those bills that you have determined may be considered by the House. There is not a Member from any district in this Union who can, on behalf of his people secure the floor to ask that a bill shall be considered, unless he shall first secure your gracious consent. Sir, there is not a monarch in Europe clothed with more absolutism than you. When I arise in my seat and ask for recognition to call up some bill in which my people are interested you look over toward me with that benignant smile which always adorns your face and say, "The gentleman can not be recognized for that purpose."

Seven years ago I introduced into Congress a bill providing for the abolition of duty on printing paper, wood, and wood pulp used in its manufacture. That, sir, was a bill repealing the tax which Congress levies upon intelligence, repealing the tax levied on the school children of the Republic in the interest of the paper trust. I have introduced it every Congress since. Where is that bill now? Smothered and buried in the Committee on Ways and Means, where it will remain until the people shall rise up against the bossism which controls here.

I read the other day in one of the public journals that you, Mr. Speaker, had packed the Ways and Means Committee with ten men, whose names were given, upon whom you could rely to see that no bill should be reported looking to any reduction in the schedules of the Dingley tariff. How were you enabled to do that? By the operation of the Constitution? No; but in contravention of the Constitution. Under the rules of this House and their despotic administration you have wrought a subversion of our representative Government. The Ways and Means Committee, presided over by the able gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], was packed with ten stand-patters, constituting a majority, who were pledged to sit on the lid at your dictation and make it impossible for the other 375 Members of this House to enact any legislation which you do not favor. Many bills for the relief of the people have been introduced and referred to that committee, but they can not be gotten out of there and brought to a vote by any process within the control of the membership of this House. Why? Because, sir, you have organized that committee so that it shall be subject to your dictation—the dictation (I say it kindly, but I say it positively) of a "boss;" a "boss," a man who sits as the absolute despot in control over the deliberations of this House, determining without limitation what shall and what shall not be considered. Every Member of this House who was elected to come here should be allowed to raise his voice and cast his vote in behalf of those measures his people are interested in, but he can not do it because of your domination.

Mr. Speaker, the American people have no longer a representative government. In days gone by I have heard you lament that the House was losing its dignity, its prestige, and its power because of Senatorial encroachment. I desire to show to the American people that this House has lost its dignity, its prestige, and its power by submitting to the tyranny of the rules and the absolutism, despotism, and bossism of the Speaker. You boast that the stand-patters have control. How did they get it? Sir, it was by your action in packing the Ways and Means Committee with ten out of eighteen men who will sit there like stone statues defying the people in obedience to your dictation. They will not let us have a vote upon the measures which have been referred to them.

Mr. Speaker, I do not voice my own sentiments alone, but those of a large proportion of the Republican membership, when I inveigh against the tyranny of your administration of the House rules. I saw a bill throttled here by the despotism and the bossism of which I am complaining, and put through in a form that was opposed by the American people and opposed by a majority of this House. It was done, sir, by your absolutism. I refer to the statehood bill. Every Member of this body would have voted to give statehood to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory if it could have been voted upon as a separate measure. Why could it not be so voted upon? Sir, it was because you, with the aid of two others on the Rules Committee, made it impossible. You expressed yourself in the Republican caucus as afraid that these Territories, if admitted to the Union, would add something to the Democratic party. These fears moved you and your Rules Committee to outrage and trample under foot the rights of the people who reside in those Territories. You refused to permit the membership of this House to enact a law which it favored. Some of you Republicans will go back to your homes and make the pitiful plea that you would have voted to admit Oklahoma and the Indian Territory if you could have done so. You will make your defense on the ground that, under the rule as enforced by the Speaker and the Rules Committee, you could not do that. I can hear some of you now saying to your people: "Oh, I was an insurgent all right; I was opposed to joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico if I could have voted on that as a separate proposition, but I was not given the opportunity." Why did you not get the opportunity? Because you voluntarily and deliberately, in the face of ample warning, voted for these rules which tie your hands, shackle your feet, and make you humble instruments of a boss. When you Republicans adopted those rules you might as well have written out your proxies, given them to the Speaker and gone home. You have no voice in this House. Your votes are cast as the Speaker directs. Every committee of this House is organized so that any bill introduced may be referred and smothered if the Speaker so desires. Ten men on the Ways and Means Committee strangle every bill that is sent there for relief against the graft of the tariff barons. If, perchance, one or two of these ten should yield and a bill should be reported, there would still remain the immortal three—the Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], constituting a majority of the Committee on Rules, who would still prevent the House from having a vote. I can not express myself so happily nor so tersely as has already been done by a Republican Member in a recent speech at another place. He said:

> Joint statehood against the wishes of the people of Arizona is unrepublican. Under the rules of the House of Representatives as administered, we are not even permitted to offer an amendment attaching a referendum to the statehood bill. Upon these questions we were regular and the party leaders were insurgents. As regards the rules of the House we are insurgents. There is nothing like these rules anywhere upon the earth nor in the heavens above.

And he might have added nor in hell below.

> They make the Speaker of the House of Representatives its master. If I wanted real power and plenty of it, I would rather be Speaker than President. We are not insurgents as regards Mr. CANNON personally. "Uncle Joe" is loved by Democrats and Republicans alike, but no officers of the great representative bodies of this nation should be given the power which the Speaker of the House now has. He names every man upon every committee. In nine cases out of ten he can prevent action upon any measure, even when it is favored by a great majority of the House. To a great extent he holds the political life of each Member of Congress in his hand. The Speaker's consent must be obtained in advance if a Member is recognized to bring up a bill. The rights which a Member of Congress now have are not so much those conferred by law as those which the Speaker may see fit to grant him. That is a condition which should not exist in a free government. It does not exist in a free government, because no government can be free that is controlled by despotism. It will be changed when the people realize the facts.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from Missouri be kind enough to tell us from whom he is reading.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. From a speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS], the single, lone Republican of all the Republican membership of this House who had the courage to vote against the adoption of the tyrannical rules by which we are controlled—those unholy rules which stifle the voice of the people and lengthen the lease of power to the trusts. All honor to the gentleman from Wisconsin! His words shall, I hope, prove to be the thin edge of a wedge that shall be driven between the people and the bosses in this House who oppress them.

I introduced some days ago a resolution asking that the House proceed to the consideration of my bill for removing the duty from wood pulp and printing paper. Where is that resolution now? It is buried deep down in the Rules Committee, where it will remain unless the people shall rise in their might and overthrow the despotism by which they are here oppressed. Mr. Speaker, the people have set their faces against bosses and bossism. You may for a time exercise the oppressive and repressive power which you enjoy, but it can not last. Would you know the fate in store for bosses? I refer you to Cincinnati, to Ohio, to Philadelphia, to Pittsburg. The people are aroused and they will throw off the yoke of the oppressor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURTIS). The question is on the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS, COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 4229, to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as hereinafter provided, to sell or dispose of unallotted lands in the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington.

SEC. 2. That as soon as the lands embraced within the diminished Colville Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments of the same to be made to all persons belonging to or having tribal relations on said Colville Indian Reservation, to each man, woman, and child 80 acres, and, upon the approval of such allotments by the Secretary of the Interior, he shall cause patents to issue therefor under the provisions of the general allotment law of the United States.

SEC. 3. That upon the completion of said allotments to said Indians the residue or surplus lands—that is, lands not allotted or reserved for Indian school, agency, or other purposes—of the said diminished Colville Indian Reservation shall be classified under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior as irrigable lands, grazing lands, timber lands, mineral lands, or arid lands, and shall be appraised under their appropriate classes by legal subdivisions, with the exception of the lands classed as mineral lands, which need not be appraised and which shall be disposed of as hereinafter provided, and, upon completion of the classification and appraisement, such surplus lands shall be open to settlement and entry at not less than their appraised value by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which these lands shall be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof: Provided, That the price of said lands when entered shall be fixed by the appraisement, as herein provided for, which shall be paid in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior upon the following terms: One-fifth of the purchase price to be paid in cash at the time of entry and the balance in five equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry, and in case any entryman fails to make the annual payments, or any of them, promptly when due all rights in and to the land covered by his or her entry shall cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry canceled, and the lands shall be reoffered for sale and entry: Provided further, That the lands remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the opening of the said lands to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than $1 per acre, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and that any lands remaining unsold ten years after the said lands shall have been opened to entry may be sold to the highest bidder for cash without regard to the above minimum limit of price: And provided further, That sections 16 and 36 of said lands be, and they are hereby, excepted from the foregoing provisions and are hereby granted to the State of Washington for school purposes, and the United States shall pay to said Indians therefor the sum of $1.25 per acre.

SEC. 4. That the said lands shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the time when and the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, and enter any of said lands except as prescribed in such proclamation: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and Spanish wars, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged.

SEC. 5. That only mineral entry may be made on such of said lands as are designated and classified as mineral under the general provisions of the mining laws of the United States, and mineral entry may also be made on any of said lands, whether designated as mineral lands or otherwise, the classification under the agreement being only prima facie evidence of the mineral or nonmineral character of the same: Provided, That no such mineral selection shall be permitted upon any lands allotted in severalty to the Indians.

SEC. 6. That all of said lands returned and classified as timber lands shall be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior under sealed bids to the highest bidder for cash or at public auction, as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 7. That the proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of the lands aforesaid, including the sums paid for mineral and townsite lands shall be, after deducting the expenses incurred from time to time in connection with the allotment, appraisement, and sales, and surveys, herein provided, deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Colville and confederated tribes of Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and shall be expended for their benefit, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the education and improvement of said Indians, and in the purchase of stock cattle, horse teams, harness, wagons, mowing machines, horserakes, thrashing machines, and agricultural implements for issue to said Indians, and also for the purchase of material for the construction of houses or other necessary buildings, and a reasonable sum may also be expended by the Secretary, in his discretion, for the comfort, benefit, and improvement of said Indians: Provided, That a portion of the proceeds may be paid to the Indians in cash per capita, share and share alike, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, such payments will further tend to improve the condition and advance the progress of said Indians, but not otherwise.

SEC. 8. That any of said lands necessary for agency, school, and religious purposes, and any lands now occupied by the agency buildings, and the site of any sawmill, gristmill, or other mill property on said lands are hereby reserved from the operation of this act: Provided, That all such reserved lands shall not exceed in the aggregate three sections and must be selected in legal subdivisions conformable to the public surveys, such selection to be made by the Indian agent of the Colville Agency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and subject to his approval.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby vested with full power and authority to make all needful rules and regulations as to the manner of sale, notice of same, and other matters incident to the carrying out of the provisions of this act, and with authority to reappraise and reclassify said lands if deemed necessary from time to time, and to continue making sales of the same, in accordance with the provisions of this act, until all of the lands shall have been disposed of.

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to bind the United States to find purchasers for any of said lands, it being the purpose of this act merely to have the United States act as trustee for said Indians in the disposition and sales of said lands and to expend or pay over to them the proceeds derived from the sales as herein provided.

SEC. 11. That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey, allot, classify, appraise, and conduct the sale and entry of said lands as in this act provided the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be reimbursed from the proceeds of the sales of the aforesaid lands: Provided, That when funds shall have been procured from the first sales of the land the Secretary of the Interior may use such portion thereof as may be actually necessary in conducting future sales and otherwise carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That nothing contained in this act shall prohibit the Secretary of the Interior from reserving from said lands, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, such tracts for town-site purposes, as in his opinion may be required for the future public interests, and he may cause any such reservations, or parts thereof, to be surveyed into blocks and lots of suitable size, and to be appraised and disposed of under such regulations as he may prescribe, and the net proceeds derived from the sale of such lands shall be paid to said Indians, as provided in section 7 of this act.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation of this bill. This is a Senate bill. Has it been reported by the committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There was a similar House bill reported with amendments, which amendments I expect to offer to this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. What committee reported it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Committee on Indian Affairs. This is a bill to carry out certain provisions of an agreement made and entered into December 1, 1905, and provides for the opening of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation and the disposition of the lands thereof upon certain terms and conditions. It provides that an allotment of 80 acres shall be made to each man, woman, and child, and then for the classification and appraisement of the lands, after which they are to be subject to entry under the homestead laws. They are not to be disposed of for less than the appraised value, and what the entryman pays goes into the fund for the benefit of the Indians; after five years the lands so left undisposed of may be put up for sale at not less than a dollar an acre, and the proceeds will go to the Indians.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. How is the appraisal to be made?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. That is the usual provision in these bills. Then, after ten years, any lands remaining undisposed of can be sold to the highest bidders under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary, the proceeds of such sale to go into said fund, and I will say to the gentleman that I shall offer one amendment, to strike out the provision granting to the State of Washington sections 16 and 36 and paying to the Indians $1.25 an acre, and just simply leave it to the State to make its selections elsewhere. Therefore it will not take a dollar out of the Treasury except for surveys, which in the end will be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the sale of the land. We have public lands which are probably just as good from which the State can select. The Indians will get just as much and possibly more in this way, as the lands will likely sell for more than $1.25.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman to explain the difference between the bill reported by the Indian Committee and the bill under consideration now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is practically no difference. One of the amendments reported by the committee was to strike out section 5, which provides for the disposition of the mineral lands. They struck that out, and simply put it under the general mining laws of the United States. That left it somewhat definite, so that there would be no question about how it would be done, and then another amendment, which I shall offer, providing that if any of the lands of this reservation—and I will state to the gentleman that this amendment has been submitted to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and he has examined it carefully and has no objection—can be reclaimed under any feasible irrigation project they are allowed to be disposed of under the reclamation act, the cost under such reclamation act to be in addition to the appraised value. Those are substantially the amendments the House committee reported.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, as I understand the gentleman, the mineral lands opened under this bill will be opened under the general mining laws of the United States?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. The timber lands are appraised and disposed of at public sale or under sealed bids.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask whether or not there have already been taken from public lands of the United States situate in the State of Washington any lands in lieu of sections 16 and 32?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I don't know whether the State has made selection in the place of these lands or not as yet. It may have done so, but under the amendment I shall offer those will not be purchased by the United States, and we will be allowed to make selections outside.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The reason I ask the question is that sometimes when these lands have been withdrawn by the President under his proclamation the State has been recouped by giving it other lands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I don't know whether that was the case here or not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I don't know whether they have made any selection. If they have, of course those selections will go, because the amendment I am going to offer will cut out purchasing these lands for the State and allow the State to come in under the general lieu-selection law.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington a question. The enabling act, under which Washington came into the Union, guaranteed to the State of Washington sections 16 and 36 in the Indian reservation in the State, did it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I don't remember just the provision, but, as I understand it, there is a general law allowing us to select lands in lieu of sections 16 and 36 embraced in the reservation if we do not secure these sections.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is there any law that can compel the State of Washington to select lands other than sections 16 and 36 in this Indian reservation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, I suppose we could not compel it to do it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then is there not liable to be a conflict between the State and the United States when you come to apply this bill as to sections 16 and 36, because under this bill sections 16 and 36 will probably be sold the same as the other lands?

Mr. JONES of Washington. These lands are not restored to the public domain under this bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Indian title, whatever it is, is going to be extinguished.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Whenever that Indian title is extinguished it goes into the hands of private parties, and the State then could not come in and make any claim. You will note that the Indian title is not extinguished until the land is disposed of under the terms of this bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I believe this is the particular reservation where the Indian title is very doubtful.

Mr. JONES of Washington. To a certain extent that is true, although the Department insists very strongly that this is Indian land just the same as if it were a treaty reservation, and this bill treats it as we have done other reservations and gives the Indians all the proceeds.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is denominated, however, as an executive reservation, and not a reservation created by reason of any treaty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true, but the Department takes the ground that it is the same in effect.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, there are in the State of Washington public lands which the State could select in lieu of these in the reservation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to make a suggestion in the nature of a question to the gentleman. In dealing with these Indian matters the House ought to know everything that is being done. This treaty under which land is being opened had two features to it; one requiring that the Government should pay for the north half of the reservation, heretofore disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to explain that.

Mr. LACEY. The other provided for the opening of the south half. I think it would be well for the gentleman from Washington to explain to the House the divisibility of these two propositions, and the effect of opening the south half without paying for the north half, as to whether that would bar the rights of the Indians in the future to still further insist upon their claim to the million and a half dollars for the north half of the reservation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will do so. I will say this reservation was established in the first place by Executive order, as stated. In 1892, I think it was, we passed a law opening the north half of this reservation, vacating it, declaring it to be public land. An agreement had been made with the Indians by a commission appointed, and it was agreed to pay these Indians $1,500,000 for the north half. Congress did not ratify that agreement, but passed a law restoring the land to the public domain and providing that the homesteader should pay a dollar and a half an acre in addition. This dollar and a half was to go into the Treasury, subject to appropriation for a public purpose, but until so appropriated was to be used for the benefit of the Indians. Then in 1903, I think it was, in the Fifty-seventh or Fifty-eighth Congress, we passed a law relieving the homesteader from paying that $1.50. Now, the Indians have presented from time to time a claim to the Government for the north half of the reservation for $1,500,000. The Department thinks that the Indians have a just claim. In the last session of Congress an amendment was put on the Indian appropriation bill to pay them $1,500,000 for the north half. That amendment did not pass. During last summer the Government sent a special agent or inspector to negotiate with these Indians with reference to the opening of the south half, and they reached an agreement with the Indians upon it. The agreement provided that the Indians should be paid $1,500,000 for their claim to the land in the north half. It also provided that the lands of the south half should be opened substantially as is provided in this bill. The committee considered that these two propositions were independent of each other as to their merit. That whether the Indians should be paid a million and a half dollars for the north half was a proposition independent in itself and had nothing to do with whether or not the south half should be opened, and the committee has a bill pending before it to pay to the Indians $1,500,000 for the north half. They have reported this bill, however, because they consider that it is decidedly beneficial to the Indians whether they are paid the million and a half dollars or not. That the south half should be opened, and that the Indians should get the proceeds from the sale of these lands is entirely independent of the claims as to the north half, so that it seems to me there are two distinct propositions, absolutely distinct, and so it seemed to the committee. The merit of one does not depend upon the other for its merit, and therefore the committee has reported this bill separately.

The testimony all goes to show that the Indians in the north half, that has been opened and where allotments have been made, have progressed far more rapidly than those in the south half. That is the report and statement of the inspector in his report, and if the Indians do not get anything out of their claim in the near future for the north half they will get something out of the disposition of these lands and be greatly benefited by its passage. It is doing them no good now.

Mr. HINSHAW. Then the passage of this bill does not in any manner affect the old contention?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not affect that claim at all; it simply affects the south half.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact these Indians have always refused to negotiate for the opening of the south half unless there was provision for the payment of the former claim?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think any attempts were made to negotiate for the south half until last summer. I may be mistaken, but I think not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the last Congress the committee reported a bill providing that this land should be restored to the public domain, making no provision for the payment to the Indians of the value of the land not utilized in making allotments, except so far as the land was taken under the homestead law. Now, in what respect does this bill differ?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It differs absolutely in this: This bill provides that these lands shall be classified and appraised by the Secretary of the Interior under rules and regulations prescribed by him and for a period of five years be disposed of at not less than the appraised value.

Any lands undisposed of after five years may be disposed of at not less than a dollar an acre. After ten years they may be disposed of at public sale, all the proceeds to go to the Indians. In other words, this provides for the sale of the lands for what they will bring, and all of the money goes to the Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there a provision in this bill that it shall not be operative unless the consent of the Indians is obtained?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; because the Indians have agreed to that proposition. That is part of the agreement. It is true they make it conditional on the payment of $1,500,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They made an agreement that these lands be opened upon condition that they be paid $1,500,000 for lands taken away from them, and now the committee holds that in abeyance and provides for the ratification of that part of the agreement that opens up these lands, which means in all probability that they will never be paid for the lands in the north half.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think that it means that at all. The committee took the view that they were two independent propositions; that the Indians could get everything out of these lands that they would bring, and that they would realize from them, and that it is better for the Indians, even if they do not get the $1,500,000, that they should get something out of these lands, because as long as they are not opened up they get nothing at all. They do not till them, because there is no allotment made to the individual Indians, and there is no inducement, no incentive, no encouragement to him to work, because he has no specific tract of land upon which to bestow his efforts. So by taking that view—we have not passed on the other proposition at all—it was thought far better for the Indians that it should be done. The committee looked at the matter from the standpoint of good to the Indians. This is the view Congress should take, that legislation should be enacted that will best promote their happiness, development, and civilization.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would suggest that the Indians are in no wise affected by the passage of the bill as to the south half of the lands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are affected to this extent: As long as the lands of the south half of the reservation are not disposed of there will always be a desire on the part of a great many people to have that portion of the reservation opened, and the result will be that negotiations can be conducted with the Indians; but once the south half is opened there is no further reason for anybody to negotiate with the Indians, and their claim for the $1,500,000, which should have been paid to them, will rest forever here.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This does not prejudice their claim.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it will take away from them the only opportunity they will have to get it paid.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Congress can not be forced to do it now, so why should they be forced to do it in the future? This should be held over the heads of Congress and prevent the development of that country and the sale of the Indian lands because it happens to be a contested claim for the north half.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was an agreement made for the opening of the north half. The Indians agreed that it be opened upon condition that they be paid a million and five hundred thousand dollars. Congress, instead of doing that, declared the surplus lands of the north half part of the public domain and opened it to entry under the homestead law, and afterwards made it free home territory, so that the Indians got nothing. Then it was proposed to do the same with this portion of the reservation, the south half, and that was prevented in the last Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This bill, however, provides for making good to the Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill provides now, after the agreement was negotiated in which the Indians insist as a condition upon which they agree to the opening of the south half, that they be paid for the lands taken from them in the north half. That condition is ignored by the committee and is stated to be a separate proposition, and they proceed to allot and also dispose of the surplus lands of the south half and leave the claim for compensation for the north end suspended in the air.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman hold that the United States Government has a right to take charge of this land, irrespective of any claim of the Indians?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has the power to dispose of these lands for the welfare of the Indians; but that does not justify Congress in depriving these Indians unjustly of what belongs to them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We do not propose to do that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York that this bill does not ratify any agreement whatever. There is no reference to any treaty or any agreement in this bill. The Committee on Indian Affairs has taken the position that it will consider measures that may come before the committee disposing of Indian lands for the best interest of the Indians, regardless of whether there is an agreement with the Indians or not. Now, in this particular case it does happen that there is an agreement with the Indians substantially the same as this bill, but this bill does not ratify or refer directly to the agreement. What objection can the gentleman have to a bill that provides that the land shall be appraised, and can only be sold at the appraised valuation, and the proceeds for the same shall be paid to the Indians? Does it matter that the Indians have an old claim that originated thirteen or fourteen years ago, that we should wait to legislate to dispose of this south half of this reservation, when it is manifest that it will be for their best interests to have the surplus and unused land sold for their benefit?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It will certainly be in the interests of these Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman stated that this bill ratifies a portion of the agreement that was made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not ratify in specific terms the agreement, but it carries out the provisions of the agreement substantially. It in no wise ratifies the agreement, but it is planned to carry out the very things that were provided for in the agreement with reference to the disposition of the land, and carries it out absolutely so far as it affects the Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have endeavored to obtain a copy of the report, but I am informed the report is out of print.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a copy of the report here. I am taking the Senate bill from the Speaker's table and am proposing to amend it so as to make it exactly the same as reported to the House.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does the gentleman think that this opening of the southern half will have anything to do with enabling the Indians to get their million and a half for their interest in the northern half?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it will have any effect one way or the other. That will rest on its own merits.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I agree with the statement made by the gentleman, that it will be greatly to the benefit of the Indians to deal with this southern half as an independent proposition, and I am going to support the bill to open it. At the same time I can see how possibly it might place them in a position less advantageous to get their million and a half for their northern interest than they are now in.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it will. I do not think it would make any difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply wish to say this: I will not object to the consideration of this bill, because I recollect the difficulty I had in the last Congress preventing the passage of a bill which took this land from these Indians and restored it to the public domain upon the theory that the Indians had no title to the land. This bill is a vast improvement upon the one pressed for passage in the last Congress. I am glad to say that the effect of my action has been of some benefit to the Indians, because this bill recognizes their title to the land and provides that the surplus shall be sold and that they shall be compensated for all land in the southern half of the reservation that will not be used in the allotment. Under the provisions of this bill I do not believe that an attempt will be made hereafter to make this land subject to the "free-home" law, and the Indians thus deprived of compensation. I would prefer that the claim—the just claim for compensation for the north half—were adjusted now, and I shall be glad to aid the gentleman to secure legislation for that purpose in the future.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The gentleman is certainly entitled to great credit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These Indians have never received the million and a half dollars to which they are entitled for the northern half of the reservation, and despite the ability, earnestness, and aggressiveness of the gentleman from Washington he will have great difficulty under present conditions to obtain it for them. So long as the Indians will get the benefit of the money that will come from the sale of these lands, however, rather than put them back in a position where, perhaps, Congress might at some time take this land without compensation and return it to the public domain, I will not object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer an amendment in line 12 of the bill as printed. I do not know whether that is the bill that the Clerk has. After the words "shall be disposed of," page 2, line 12, strike out the words "as hereinafter provided" and insert in lieu thereof "under the general mining laws of the United States."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the words "disposed of," strike out the words "as hereinafter provided" and insert in lieu thereof "under the general mining laws of the United States."

Also, page 2, line 14, after the word "entry," insert "under the provisions of the homestead law."

Also, page 2, line 15, after the word "value," insert "in addition to the fees and commissions now prescribed by law for the disposition of lands of the value of $1.25 per acre."

Also, page 3, line 19, after the word "acre," insert "And provided also, That if the State of Washington has made any selections under existing law in lieu of sections 16 and 36 of the lands affected by this act the acreage of such selections shall be deducted from the acreage to be paid for under the preceding proviso.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that the other amendments be adopted first, and I will withdraw the amendment just read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments as reported.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the word "price," in line 14, down—the remainder of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "price," in line 14. Strike out all the remainder of the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was reported by the Clerk, as follows:

On page 4, in line 1, after the word "proclamation," substitute a period instead of the colon, and strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is an amendment offered by the committee. The part which it is proposed to strike out reads in this way:

Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and Spanish wars, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged.

That is a committee amendment—that is, it is an amendment proposed by the committee to the House bill which has been reported; but several members of the committee have expressed a desire to me that that provision should be retained in the bill, and I would rather like to see it retained there. Therefore, I ask that that amendment be voted down.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington if under the terms of this bill the Secretary of the Interior has power to apply what is known as the "lottery system" in the disposition of these lands?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I presume so. It provides for the disposal under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In other words, it is the same language that is used in laws where the lottery system has been adopted by the Department in disposing of Indian lands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I think so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like to ask the gentleman also, if the right of commutation is not given in this bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so, and I think it ought to be, because each entryman, whether he commutes or not, must pay the appraised value of the lands.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then will the gentleman state to the House what advantage a soldier has by reason of that proviso being in the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it will amount to anything for him, but it is largely a sentimental matter, and it is done in almost all these bills, and I would rather that it be left in this bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not true that sections 2304 and 2305 give to Union soldiers the right, in acquiring title under the homestead laws, to have credit for the time they served in the Army?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is not that the principal benefit and advantage that a soldier has?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That, I think, is the only one.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. With one exception, and that 's that a soldier may file a declaratory statement by power of attorney. Now, is it not a fact that in practically all of the openings similar to the opening that will occur if this bill becomes a law, the only speculation that has been indulged in has been by agents going in some instances to Soldiers' Homes and going generally over the country and getting soldiers to give them powers of attorney to file a declaratory statement, which the agent would file, and that they were subsequently relinquished, probably for a substantial consideration, to the agent, and only in exceptional cases has the soldier made his entry as he must do within six months after the filing of the declaratory.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be true. I could not say as to that. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I merely state this, Mr. Speaker, because I am a member of the committee that reported this bill. I made this report, and I favored eliminating that provision, not because I wanted to do any harm to the old soldiers or take away from them any rights, but because the entryman, whether he is a soldier or whether he is not a soldier, is obliged to pay the appraised price of the land. He gets no benefit by reason of the fact that he served in the Army for any considerable time or any time whatever, whereas under the old homestead law he would be entitled to credit for the time he served.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Am I to understand that under this bill, if it becomes a law, these soldiers of the late civil war and the soldiers of the Spanish-American war who enter this land do not get credit for the time they served in the Army?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is no such thing as giving them credit, for the reason that they have to pay for the land. They may commute after eight months' residence, and acquire title, or they may live there for five years, but they have got to pay for the land whether they live there eight months or whether they live there five years, and consequently there is no benefit to the soldier in this legislation unless it is in permitting him to make a filing by delegating somebody or giving some one power of attorney to file a declaratory statement for him. The soldier does not have to swear to anything; he does not have to promise to do anything, and the minute his declaratory statement is filed he can sell his right without ever going near the land and without ever having any intention of going to the land; the experience in the Rosebud opening in South Dakota was that many of these soldiers simply sold out when they gave their powers of attorney. In any event, only in a few cases where a declaration was filed did the soldier perfect his entry.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Committee on Indian Affairs——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will pardon me, the only speculation connected with the disposition of the land on the Rosebud Reservation was by reason of speculators who filed soldiers' declaratories by power of attorney.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that is the reason why the Committee on Indian Affairs refused to have that done in this bill?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is the reason. The committee is not insistent if the House would rather leave that provision in, but it does not do anybody any good. If it would benefit any old soldier I would most certainly be in favor of leaving it in.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It looks to me as though the committee's amendment is a wise one. We do not want to give speculators a chance to make the money and be of no benefit to the old soldier.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the reason the committee took the action they did.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not insistent. I am willing to let the House vote on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Washington that we are considering the Senate bill and not the House bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood the Clerk had reported the amendment to strike out the proviso on page 4, and that is what we have been discussing.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill is being considered and not the House bill. Does the gentleman from Washington desire to offer the amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do—that is, I want to offer it, because it was reported by the committee as an amendment to the House bill, and I want to keep full faith with the committee, but would prefer that it be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 1, after the word "proclamation," substitute a period for the colon, and strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want that amendment voted down, but I leave it to the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then why does the gentleman offer it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer it because the committee offered it.

The amendment was considered and rejected.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 4, strike out all of section 5 and renumber the succeeding sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

Page 4, line 23, after the word "proceeds," insert "not including fees and commissions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

On page 5, line 11, after the words "thrashing machine," insert the word "others."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

Page 6, line 20, before the word "proceeds," insert the word "net."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

Insert a new section to stand as section 12, to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That if any of the lands of said diminished Colville Indian Reservation can be included in any feasible irrigation project under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to withhold said lands from disposition under this act and to dispose of them under the said reclamation act, and the charges provided for by said reclamation act shall be in addition to the appraised value of said lands fixed as hereinbefore provided and shall be paid in annual installments as required under the said reclamation act, and the amounts to be paid for the land, according to appraisement, shall be credited to the fund herein established for the benefit of the Colville Indians."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent a similar House bill (H. R. 14314) was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES AND DISTRICT COURTS AT EUREKA, CAL.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15521) establishing regular terms for the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of California at Eureka.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be two terms each of the United States district and circuit courts for the northern district of California held in the city of Eureka, Cal., in each year from and after the passage of this act, said terms to begin on the second Monday in January and the second Monday in August and continue as long as the business may require: Provided, however, That Humboldt County, Cal., shall furnish a suitable place in which to hold said court, free of all charges and expenses, until such time as the United States shall make provisions for a place in which to hold the same.

SEC. 2. That the clerk of the district and circuit courts for the northern district of California and the marshal and district attorney for said district shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively, for said courts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GILLETT of California, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GRANTING LANDS TO BILOXI, MISS.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10152) granting certain lands to the city of Biloxi, Harrison County, Miss., for park, cemetery, and hospital purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described land, to wit, that part of section 19, township 7 south, of range 9 west, lying south of Back Bay of Biloxi, the northwest quarter of section 30, township 7 south, of range 9 west, and all of section 24, township 7 south, of range 10 west, lying south of Back Bay of Biloxi, formerly reserved for naval purposes, and which were restored to disposition under the town-site laws under the act of Congress approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to certify to the Secretary of the Interior, for restoration to the public domain, lands in the States of Alabama and Mississippi not needed for naval purposes," be, and the same is hereby, granted to the city of Biloxi, in Harrison County, Miss., for park, cemetery, and hospital purposes, and the Secretary of the Interior is, upon the passage of this act, authorized to cause the said lands to be patented to the said city of Biloxi.

SEC. 2. That the said lands are granted solely for park, cemetery, and hospital purposes, and shall revert to and become the property of the United States if used for any purpose whatever other than or foreign to those for which this donation is made.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 4, page 2, after the word "park," insert the word "and."
In line 5, page 2, strike out the words "and hospital."
In line 7, page 2, after the word "Biloxi," insert the words "upon due proof of its incorporation."
In line 10, page 2, before the word "cemetery," insert the word "and;" after the word "cemetery" strike out the words "and hospital."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting certain lands to the city of Biloxi, in Harrison County, Miss., for park and cemetery purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what the United States has been using this land for?

Mr. BOWERS. They have not been using it at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Did they ever use it?

Mr. BOWERS. No, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. What were the lands reserved for?

Mr. BOWERS. Many years ago in the original surveys wherever any live oak timber was found that land was reserved for naval purposes, under the idea that we were going to build wooden ships. That was abandoned, of course, and by act of Congress these naval-reserve lands were restored to the public domain. This land is just outside of the city of Biloxi about a mile. Under the general law any municipality may enter 160 acres of land within a given radius—3 miles I believe—of the city limits for park and cemetery purposes. This tract here is somewhat in excess of that number of acres, and therefore this bill was introduced authorizing this grant to the city of Biloxi. The bill has received the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands. It is indorsed by the Interior Department. There are a number of precedents for such grants, a memoranda of which I have here. The land is suited for park purposes, the greater part of it. There is some of it that is not, being, as I am advised, somewhat marshy.

Mr. PAYNE. How much is there of it?

Mr. BOWERS. The Land Office reports 377 acres, but a map which I have here and which I am satisfied is accurate, makes the amount 300 acres. It borders on the back bay of Biloxi and some of it is marshy, and I suppose that the shifting of the lines of the water accounts for this discrepancy between the map which I have and the acreage reported by the Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I notice that this report reads, "Committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed," and I presume it would be in order for me to request unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, which I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one question. Is this timber still standing?

Mr. BOWERS. No. There is very little. The policy was wherever they found any live-oak timber at all to retain it. There are some live-oak trees, some very handsome ones.

Mr. LACEY. Are the trees still standing that were originally there?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes; except what has been cut by depredators.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. BOWERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TO CONSOLIDATE THE CITY OF SOUTH M'ALESTER AND THE TOWN OF M'ALESTER, IND. T.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12845) to consolidate the city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, in the Indian Territory, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the qualified voters of the city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, of the Indian Territory, did, on the 7th day of November, 1905, by a majority vote in each of said municipalities, declare in favor of merging the said municipalities into one single city, to be known as McAlester: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the said act of consolidation is approved, and that the city of McAlester is hereby created a city of the first class in the Indian Territory, with legal succession to all public property now belonging to the incorporated city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, and said city of McAlester shall have power to exercise municipal jurisdiction over the area of territory embraced in and platted as the town sites of South McAlester and McAlester by the Choctaw Town Site Commission, according to act of June 28, 1898, and subsequently.

SEC. 2. That all indebtedness due by either of said municipalities at the date of passage of this bill shall become the debt of the city of McAlester.

With the following amendments:

Strike out the preamble.
Line 3, strike out the word "said;" and same line, after the word "consolidation," add "adopted by the city of South McAlester and the town of McAlester, of the Indian Territory."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

SCANDINAVIAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN LITTLE MISSOURI RIVER CONGREGATION.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9165) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents to the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Little Missouri River congregation to certain lands for cemetery purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Little Missouri River congregation, for cemetery purposes, to the following-described land, to wit: The southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 12, in township 15 north, of range 1 east of the Black Hills meridian, in the county of Butte and State of South Dakota, containing an area of 10 acres of land, said patent to contain the provision that said land shall be used for cemetery purposes only: Provided, That the said association pay $1.25 per acre therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. FRANCIS RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15583) to authorize the Madison Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in St. Francis County, Ark., at or near the town of Madison, in said county and State, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DOCUMENTS ISSUED TO SHIPS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Department of Commerce and Labor I introduced a bill to-day looking to a simplification of documents issued to ships and vessels in the merchant marine of the United States. Accompanying that bill is a brief of the reasons for the asking of the passage of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENDING IRRIGATION ACT TO THE STATE OF TEXAS.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14184) to extend the irrigation act to the State of Texas.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, be, and the same are hereby, extended so as to include and apply to the State of Texas.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what committee reported this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Mr. LACEY. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. LACEY. The proposition, as I understand it, is to take the proceeds of the sale of lands in North Dakota and California, etc., and spend it in irrigation in the State of Texas?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. This is to put Texas on an equal footing in regard to irrigation——

Mr. LACEY. No; the Texas land does not go into the irrigation fund, does it?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. There is no unappropriated public domain in Texas.

Mr. LACEY. Texas reserves her domain to the State?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. And she still has lands fully the size of the State of Kansas——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. No, sir; that has long since been appropriated for other purposes.

Mr. LACEY. Has she not under lease—do they not have hundreds of thousands of acres of land under lease to people in the State of Texas?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That has been appropriated for the public school fund. I will state to the gentleman that the public lands of Texas have gone just like the public lands of the Government—for internal improvements, such as railways, transcontinental lines across the State, educational purposes, and free homes; just like other lands of the Government.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The President recommends this measure in his message.

Mr. LACEY. I observed that he did, but I supposed that it was certainly an entire oversight that in a State as big as Texas, equal to five other States, holding all the public land for her own use, not letting a dollar go to any public purpose since its admission into the Union, to now appropriate to herself the proceeds of the public lands of the State of Nebraska, the State of Wyoming, to have that sold and the money turned into the irrigation fund and the irrigation fund used for the improvement of the State of Texas is certainly a proposition that has a good deal of originality in it and some little of assurance.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Just a moment. The gentleman misunderstands——

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe I will object for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

[For message see Senate proceedings of Monday, March 5, 1906.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, does that involve the printing of the message as a document?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAPRON). The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio it did not come to this House, but went to the Senate.

Mr. KEIFER. Is the message not addressed to both Houses?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a message to both Houses.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it ought to be printed as a document, not only on account of its recommendations on the subject of fortifications, but on account of its historical character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the message will be printed as a result of the reference.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I suppose it ought to be ordered printed by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that under the rule it will be printed.

DISPOSITION OF THE AFFAIRS OF THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES OF INDIAN TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, with sundry Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] moves that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and asks for a conference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What bill is that?

Mr. CURTIS. It is the Indian Territory bill. I will state for the information of the House that I have asked that the amendments be again printed and numbered, so that the bill can be had in the morning.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is the bill that the gentleman talked to me about the other day?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Relating to the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection by the House, the Chair will appoint the following Members as conferees: Messrs. SHERMAN, CURTIS, and STEPHENS of Texas.

There was no objection.

SALLIE F. SHEFFIELD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8493) granting an increase of pension to Sallie F. Sheffield, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

RUFUS G. CHILDRESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the bill H. R. 2897, which has been returned by the Senate for amendment, and of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 2897) granting an increase of pension to Rufus G. Childress.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARTHUR THOMPSON.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 1889) granting an increase of pension to Arthur Thompson, and it was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. MORRELL, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MINOR, for one week, on account of important business.

NORTHERN SECURITIES COMPANY.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by the direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up for passage House resolution No. 117.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] calls up a House resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General is requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the House whether any criminal prosecutions have been instituted by the Department of Justice against the individuals or corporations who were adjudged recently by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Northern Securities case, to be guilty of having violated the laws of the United States by entering into unlawful combinations in restraint of interstate commerce, and to send to the House all papers and documents and other information upon any prosecutions inaugurated or about to be inaugurated in that behalf.

Also the following amendments:

Amend after the word "not," in the first line, and before the word "incompatible," in the second line, by inserting the words "in his judgment."

And further amend by striking out after the word "commerce," in lines 8 and 9, all of the remainder of the line 9 and lines 10 and 11.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I merely ask a vote on the amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. The people of the United States, I think, know now, whether they have known until lately or not, that only the execution of the criminal feature of the antitrust law in the shape of imprisonment will stop the violations of that law. Injunctions sued out will be evaded, fines levied will be easily paid. Nothing short of the exercise of the power of imprisonment in the law will stop the violations of the law. We know it in the case of the beef trust, and we know it in this particular case about which the inquiry is made. One year and ten months ago, Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States delivered an opinion in the case of The United States v. The Northern Securities Company, which demonstrated beyond all peradventure of a doubt a flagrant, undenied violation of the antitrust law. An injunction which was sued out was upheld by the court. As far as we know, it has made no change in the relation of the parties to one another or in the relation of the combination itself to the affairs of the country. An injunction in the beef-trust case has met just exactly with that same fate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this grows out of the fact that we are rapidly reaching a condition of things in the United States where an executive is no longer merely an executive, but indulges in "discretion" as to the execution of the laws as they are written.

Mr. Speaker, if a man acquainted with the history of the English-speaking race in its several places of residence were called upon to define what a free people is, he would say that a free people is a people governed impersonally by law, and laws enacted by their representatives freely chosen and executed by the executive as the laws are written. It is no part of the executive's duty to indulge in any reflection as to the wisdom or unwisdom or the policy of the law which he is called upon to execute. He is the executive—the branch which executes—and in the United States, as if we wanted to emphasize the fact, we call him the President, a man who presides. Except in so far as he is armed with the approving and veto power, he is no part of the legislative branch. He is never a legislator after a law is passed. Never a judge at all. He is the servant of the people and the servant of the legislature to execute the law as the law is written upon the statute books—ita lex scripta. And that is equally true of the executive in any free country, whether it be a country where the executive reigns, but does not rule, as in Great Britain; in a country where he rules, but does not reign, as in a modern spirit of snobbery we begin to say he does in the United States of America; or in a country where he neither rules nor reigns, as in France. Everywhere in self-governing lands his duty is a duty to execute and nothing else. Now, Mr. Speaker, the American House of Commons—the American House of Representatives—has lost is just ultimate control over the other branches of this Government. It was thought by the men who adopted the Constitution that the power to inaugurate an impeachment proceeding would hold the executive and judicial officers to some extent in awe of the law. But we have demonstrated long ago—and we have recently demonstrated in the case of a judge upon the bench—that the power of impeachment is a dead letter. We have taken the position that in order that a man shall be successfully impeached he shall be guilty of some specific crime upon the statute books, and thereby have thrown ourselves entirely outside of the history of the great right of impeachment. Our forefathers, the framers, also thought that we could hold them in check by "the power of the purse." Every liberty of the English-speaking people was obtained by the exercise of the power of the purse by putting on general legislation a statement of grievances and the remedy of grievances—putting the remedy sought by the people upon "subsidy bills," and thus saying to the Executive, "Unless you obey the old law or the provision which is contained in this law you shall not be fed from the public crib." We have by our own rule here surrendered the right of control either of the executive or the judiciary by the power of the purse when we made the rule that we could not put any new legislation or enforcement of old legislation upon an appropriation bill. It becomes all the more important, then, that Congress should recognize and hold sacred and exercise this right of inquiry—this right of petition asserted in the pending resolution.

The Executive has no right to suspend the operation of the written law whether it be by affirmative action or by nonaction. I need not tell you that although Charles I did not exactly get suspended when he undertook to suspend laws, he got treated with equal finality by having his head cut off. He had suspended the laws of Great Britain in both ways; first, in that he had by proclamation suspended them affirmatively, and, secondly, in that, by passive nonaction, he had suspended their operation negatively. Although James II was not exactly suspended, he was construed by way of technical construction into a condition of self-abnegation because he undertook to play the same game.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to the fact that the execution of this law is not discretionary, but it is mandatory.

I want to call attention to the fact that the very same act, the very same sentence, which gives the right to stop these abuses by injunction imposes upon the Executive the equal duty of stopping them by criminal prosecution. The amendment which was passed on February 25, 1903, putting in the hands of the Executive the sum of $500,000 for the purpose under which this very Northern Securities case was begun and under which the expenses were paid and under which it was carried to a successful conclusion put both of these duties in the same sentence. After the text providing for revenue of the Government for all purposes approved August 27, 1894, it says:

The sum of $500,000 is made immediately available out of any money in the Treasury not heretofore appropriated—

Now, mark this language—to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General in the employment of special counsel and agents of the Department of Justice, to conduct—proceedings, suits, and prosecutions under the said act in the courts of the United States.

What? Mark the language—

Mark you; all methods or remedy—mandatory and equally mandatory—"prosecution" with the others. The questions that remain to be determined are twofold. First, the result of this policy of suspending the law, because in the discretion of the Attorney-General or the President it is not wise to execute it as written. What is the result? Why, you saw a little of it here the other day in this Pat Crowe case. A sadder commentary upon the present conditions in America has never been presented than that. A poor little child, in its age of innocency, taken from its home and cruelly abused; merely because it was the child of a millionaire beef-packer-trust man a jury of American citizens, presumably of average sympathy and average intelligence, letting the scoundrel go unwhipped of justice—a scoundrel who deserved, so far as that is concerned, to have been burned at the stake.

And why? Simply because the child he abducted and abused was the child of a millionaire member of the beef-packers' trust. The jury, in their fanatical madness, refused to punish a crime against a little child when its father was a member of the class which obeys no law. The result, my friends, is awful to contemplate. Rich criminals are to go unwhipped of justice, and men on a jury take advantage of that fact wrongfully, abusively, and anarchically—God knows how wrongfully in that particular case—to say that those who offend against these industrial tyrants, even against the most sacred ties of family relationship, shall also go unwhipt of justice. My friends, when the people anywhere lose confidence in the equal administration of law through the courts of justice you have then reached the last point of verging upon anarchy and chaos. When you make the people believe once that the ordinary fellow, who violates the ordinary statutes of the country, is to be punished, but that a great, influential, rich, campaign-contributing man, who violates an anti-trust act, or who violates a railroad rebate act, or anything else, is to be punished or not within "the discretion" of the Attorney-General or the President of the United States, using their discretion to determine whether or not they shall begin prosecutions against him—in that moment of popular belief you have laid your entire institutions open to the inroads of chaotic fanatics, socialists, and anarchists, all of whom resemble one another and trust magnates in this—that none of them respect the law. The minute law becomes personal, industrial, or commercial and ceases to be impersonal, democratic institutions have begun to cease to exist. My friends, here is a result of it that I picked up in a magazine the other day. It was well described.

When Henry H. Rogers, once a grocer's boy—a driver of a delivery wagon in Fairhaven, Mass.—now vice-president of the Standard Oil Company and its executive head, was recently served with a subpœna and brought to the witness stand in proceedings conducted by Attorney-General Hadley, of Missouri, a very considerable portion of the world metaphorically pricked up its ears to hear what he might say. About all it heard was this: "On the advice of counsel, I refuse to answer." The reply was made, with the aid of four or five high-salaried lawyers, to every question of importance.

Thus, you not only teach the mob to refuse to do justice to these men because they refuse to do justice to the common people, but you teach them themselves to treat the law and its agencies in a thoroughly flippant manner, as if the agencies of the law were something beneath their notice. I notice that the press of this country has taken up the incident in that way. The New York Sun, which has been charged with being a corporation paper, still says this:

It is possible for a witness in Mr. Rogers's position to overdo this sort of thing. We are strongly of the opinion that he is overdoing it now. If Mr. Rogers and his codirectors of the Standard Oil and their able and multitudinous counsel apprehended more carefully the temper of the American people who constitute the spectators at the present spectacle, there would be less buffoonery and more seriousness and decency in their demeanor toward the representatives of even distant law.

And the New York Journal of Commerce, the mouthpiece of the greatest commercial interests of this country, pays attention to the same thing, calls Rogers's conduct "flippant," "disrespectful and sneering contempt."

Has Mr. Rogers gone mad through possession of enormous financial power?

Why, that question is asked by the Wall Street Journal itself. These people's newspapers are beginning to find it out before the Government here in Washington does. The Chicago Evening Post, a conservative paper, speaks of the unseemly spectacle:

Many legitimate interests, perhaps his own, may be injured through him. There never has been a time when honorable men of large affairs have had more need than now to make public and clear their respect for law.

Again:

This is a perilous game to play, gentlemen—

Remarks the New York Mail; and the Richmond Times-Democrat says:

Since the possession of wealth is safeguarded by law and by the law only, is it sound sense for a man of great wealth to endeavor to impress the public with the insignificance and impotency of the law?

But why should not the great of the earth treat with flippancy the laws of the country when those charged with the execution of the law, charged in the same breath as they are charged with suing out injunction with the power of criminal prosecution, use their so-called "discretion" to determine as to whether they shall or shall not execute them in the only way the criminal dreads, i. e., by imprisonment? When a late Attorney-General of the United States, after having unexpectedly to his own intent perhaps, succeeded in an injunction, passed the word down the line: "We are not going to run amuck," what did he mean by "running amuck?" Just simply executing the laws of the United States as they were written; that is all. If the laws are wrong, repeal them. The best way, as Grant said, to get rid of a bad law is to execute it. If the law is too drastic or wrong in any respect, it ought to be executed; then it will go. I picked up the Washington Post this morning, which shows how these things are treated differently abroad. The Washington Post at the end of this quotes Uncle Toby, in Tristram Shandy, who said that "they managed things differently in France." What a shame that centralized France can teach us the lesson of equal justice!

Vanderbilt and Shepherd divided southern Europe between them, the former selecting Italy as his particular scene of carnage, and the latter undertaking to do his best with the opportunities afforded him by France.

We all know what happened to young Vanderbilt. He did something to a native with his motor car, and as a result he got most of his clothes kicked off of him by a hot-blooded, impetuous populace.

The incident has now passed into history, and its moral is that the American aristocrat should not try to do business among ignorant people who have never heard how great he is. As regards young Shepard, however, the case is even more distressing. It really begins to look as though he might have to go to jail. The French court, with a callous insensibility which deeply grieves us, has decided that young Shepard can not settle for the killing of a little girl through the clearing house in Paris. It has been decreed, in fact, that he must be punished like a plain, ordinary person who has violated the law of the land. The judicial authorities apparently recognize no distinction as between a common individual and an oiled and scented foreign millionaire. Evidently, as Uncle Toby said on a very famous occasion, they manage things differently in France.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me see what ground there was to go on in the prosecution. What I shall read now is from the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan in the Northern Securities Company against the United States, Supreme Court opinion, delivered March 14, 1904:

This charter having been obtained, Hill and his associate stockholders of the Great Northern Railway Company, and Morgan and associate stockholders of the Northern Pacific Railway Company—

Now, this is the statement of facts which could have been obtained by the Attorney-General from the public records of the country—assigned to the Securities Company a controlling amount of the capital stock of the respective constituent companies upon an agreed basis of exchange of the capital stock of the Securities Company for each share of the capital stock of the other companies.

In further pursuance of the combination, the Securities Company acquired additional stock of the defendant railway companies, issuing in lieu thereof its own stock upon the above basis, and, at the time of the bringing of this suit, held, as owner and proprietor, substantially all the capital stock of the Northern Pacific Railway Company, and, it is alleged, a controlling interest in the stock of the Great Northern Railway Company, "and is voting the same and is collecting the dividends thereon, and in all respects is acting as the owner thereof, in the organization, management, and operation of said railway companies and in the receipt and control of their earnings."

* * * * * * *

The several defendants denied all the allegations of the bill imputing to them a purpose to evade the provisions of the act of Congress, or to form a combination or conspiracy having for its object either to restrain or to monopolize commerce or trade among the States or with foreign nations. They denied that any combination or conspiracy was formed in violation of the act.

In our judgment, the evidence fully sustains the material allegations of the bill, and shows a violation of the act of Congress, in so far as it declares illegal every combination or conspiracy in restraint of commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, and forbids attempts to monopolize such commerce or any part of it.

Summarizing the principal facts, it is indisputable upon this record that under the leadership of the defendants Hill and Morgan the stockholders of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway corporations, having competing and substantially parallel lines from the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean at Puget Sound combined and conceived the scheme of organizing a corporation under the laws of New Jersey, which should hold the shares of the stock of the constituent companies, such shareholders, in lieu of their shares in those companies, to receive, upon an agreed basis of value, shares in the holding corporation; that pursuant to such combination the Northern Securities Company was organized as the holding corporation through which the scheme should be executed; and under that scheme such holding corporation has become the holder—more properly speaking, the custodian—of more than nine-tenths of the stock of the Northern Pacific, and more than three-fourths of the stock of the Great Northern, the stockholders of the companies who delivered their stock receiving upon the agreed basis shares of stock in the holding corporation. The stockholders of these two competing companies disappeared, as such, for the moment, but immediately reappeared as stockholders of the holding company which was thereafter to guard the interests of both sets of stockholders as a unit, and to manage, or cause to be managed, both lines of railroad as if held in one ownership. Necessarily by this combination or arrangement the holding company in the fullest sense dominates the situation in the interest of those who were stockholders of the constituent companies; as much so, for every practical purpose, as if it had been itself a railroad corporation which had built, owned, and operated both lines for the exclusive benefit of its stockholders. Necessarily, also, the constituent companies ceased, under such a combination, to be in active competition for trade and commerce along their respective lines, and have become, practically, one powerful consolidated corporation, by the name of a holding corporation the principal, if not the sole, object for the formation of which was to carry out the purpose of the original combination under which competition between the constituent companies would cease.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I will yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how the time is to be disposed of, whether it is to be all given to one side. There may be some wanted on this side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was about to ask, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed to conclude his remarks without interfering with the time belonging to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not object to any time asked for by others, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may have half an hour to finish, without interfering with the balance of the time under the control of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I am sure I shall not need all the half hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAPRON). The gentleman from Mississippi asks that his time be extended thirty minutes without interfering with that of the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In this connection, mark you, all the evidence in this case upon which the court predicates its opinion is record evidence, deed and contract and charter evidence, every bit of it within the power of the Attorney-General of the United States to obtain and to produce.

Now, the court continues:

Those who were stockholders of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific and became stockholders in the holding company are now interested in preventing all competition between the two lines, and as owners of stock or of certificates of stock in the holding company, they will see to it that no competition is tolerated. They will take care that no persons are chosen directors of the holding company who will permit competition between the constituent companies. The result of the combination is that all the earnings of the constituent companies make a common fund in the hands of the Northern Securities Company to be distributed, not upon the basis of the earnings of the respective constituent companies, each acting exclusively in its own interests, but upon the basis of the certificates of stock issued by the holding company. No scheme or device could more certainly come within the words of the act—"combination in the form of a trust or otherwise * * * in restraint of commerce among the several States or with foreign nations"—or could more effectively and certainly suppress free competition between the constituent companies. This combination is, within the meaning of the act, a "trust;" but if not, it is a combination in restraint of interstate and international commerce; and that is enough to bring it under the condemnation of the act.

The mere existence of such a combination and the power acquired by the holding company as its trustee constitute a menace to and a restraint upon that freedom of commerce which Congress intended to recognize and protect, and which the public is entitled to have protected. If such combination be not destroyed, all the advantages that would naturally come to the public under the operation of the general laws of competition, as between the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway companies, will be lost, and the entire commerce of the immense territory in the northern part of the United States between the Great Lakes and the Pacific at Puget Sound will be at the mercy of a single holding corporation, organized in a State distant from the people of that territory.

The court further says:

That Congress has the power to establish rules by which interstate and international commerce shall be governed, and, by the antitrust act, has prescribed the rule of free competition among those engaged in such commerce;

That every combination or conspiracy which would extinguish competition between otherwise competing railroads engaged in interstate trade or commerce, and which would in that way restrain such trade or commerce, is made illegal by the act;

That the natural effect of competition is to increase commerce, and an agreement whose direct effect is to prevent this play of competition restrains instead of promoting trade and commerce;

That to vitiate a combination, such as the act of Congress condemns, it need not be shown that the combination, in fact, results or will result in a total suppression of trade or in a complete monopoly, but it is only essential to show that by its necessary operation it tends to restrain interstate or international trade or commerce or tends to create a monopoly in such trade or commerce and to deprive the public of the advantages that flow from free competition.

* * * * * * *

Whether the free operation of the normal laws of competition is a wise and wholesome rule for trade and commerce is an economic question which this court need not consider or determine. Undoubtedly, there are those who think that the general business interests and prosperity of the country will be best promoted if the rule of competition is not applied. But there are others who believe that such a rule is more necessary in these days of enormous wealth than it ever was in any former period of our history. Be all this as it may, Congress has, in effect, recognized the rule of free competition by declaring illegal every combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate and international commerce. As in the judgment of Congress the public convenience and the general welfare will be best subserved when the natural laws of competition are left undisturbed by those engaged in interstate commerce, and as Congress has embodied that rule in a statute, that must be, for all, the end of the matter, if this is to remain a government of laws, and not of men.

* * * * * * *

It is no answer to say that competition in the salt trade was not in fact destroyed, or that the price of the commodity was not unreasonably advanced. Courts will not stop to inquire as to the degree of injury inflicted upon the public; it is enough to know that the inevitable tendency of such contracts is injurious to the public.

The italics here are those of the Supreme Court, not mine.

Such a combination is more than a contract. It is an offense.

That is the language—"An offense," a crime—and as such it invited prosecution, not the mere suing out of an injunction which can be evaded by any very smart lawyer. The court goes on to say:

If the statute is beyond the constitutional power of Congress, the court would fail in the performance of a solemn duty if it did not so declare. But if nothing more can be said than that Congress has erred—and the court must not be understood as saying that it has or has not erred—the remedy for the error and the attendant mischief is the selection of new Senators and Representatives, who, by legislation, will make such changes in existing statutes, or adopt such new statutes, as may be demanded by their constituents and be consistent with law.

I desire now to call especial attention to this language of the Supreme Court because, although it applies to the power of the judiciary, and although it says that the judiciary has no discretion, being a separate and coordinate branch of the Government, to pass upon the wisdom or the unwisdom of an act of Congress, it applies equally well to the Executive:

But even if the court shared the gloomy forebodings in which the defendants indulge—

Defendants' hired lawyers had indulged in the foreboding that if the antitrust law were enforced "all business would stop" and "chaos" would result.

But to read on:

But even if the court shared the gloomy forebodings in which the defendants indulge, it could not refuse to respect the action of the legislative branch of the Government if what it has done is within the limits of its constitutional power. The suggestions of disaster to business have, we apprehend, their origin in the zeal of parties who are opposed to the policy underlying the act of Congress or are interested in the result of this particular case; at any rate, the suggestions imply that the court may and ought to refuse the enforcement of the provisions of the act if, in its judgment, Congress was not wise in prescribing as a rule by which the conduct of interstate and international commerce is to be governed, that every combination, whatever its form, in restraint of such commerce and the monopolizing or attempting to monopolize such commerce shall be illegal. These, plainly, are questions as to the policy of legislation that belong to another department, and this court has no function to supervise such legislation from the standpoint of wisdom or policy. We need only say that Congress has authority to declare, and by the language of its act, as interpreted in prior cases, has, in effect declared, that the freedom of interstate and international commerce shall not be obstructed or disturbed by any combination, conspiracy, or monopoly that will restrain such commerce, by preventing the free operation of competition among interstate carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers and freight.

I also desire the House to hear this language, which appears on page 29. This is a part of the very charter of this company which it got from Republican and corporation-ridden New Jersey, and I call attention to it in order that there may be seen from the description that the Supreme Court gives of the power in that charter that the very charter itself, without another scintilla of evidence, was "a conspiracy" to "attempt to monopolize" and was a conspiracy "in restraint of commerce between the States." Read further:

All the stock it (the holding company) held or acquired in the constituent companies was acquired and held to be used in suppressing competition between those companies. It came into existence only for that purpose. If anyone had full knowledge of what was designed to be accomplished and as to what was actually accomplished by the combination in question it was the defendant Morgan.

The Supreme Court does not hesitate to name him; Morgan, even Pierpont, the Panama Canal disbursing agent. There is nothing partisan about this. I understand Mr. Morgan does not belong to either party, rather pretends to Clevelandism.

Let me quote further:

In this instance, as we have already said, the Securities Company made itself a party to a combination in restraint of interstate commerce that antedated its organization, as soon as it came into existence, doing so, of course, under the direction of the very individuals who promoted it.

* * * * * * *

It is said that this statute contains criminal provisions and must therefore be strictly construed. The rule upon that subject is a very ancient and salutary one. It means only that we must not bring cases within the provisions of such a statute that are not clearly embraced by it, nor by narrow, technical, or forced construction of words exclude cases from it that are obviously within its provisions. What must be sought for always is the intention of the legislature, and the duty of the court is to give effect to that intention as disclosed by the words used.

As early as the case of King v. Inhabitants of Hodnett (1 T. R., 96, 101) Mr. Justice Fuller said: "It is not true that the courts in the exposition of penal statutes are to narrow the construction." In United States v. Wiltberger (5 Wheat., 76, 95), Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the judgment of this court and referring to the rule that penal statutes are to be construed strictly, said: "It is a modification of the ancient maxim, and amounts to this, that though penal laws are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not want to talk about this question until there had been an answer to this resolution. The other day, however, I rose and asked unanimous consent that I might be permitted to wait until a reply from the executive department of the Government came in to the inquiry for information, because, as I said then, it might be possible that the Department of Justice under this Dingley-tariff-blessed Administration had done something; that it had taken some steps toward the prosecution of these rich and powerful and influential criminals. The floor leader of the majority upon the floor of the House objected at that time. Of course I would have lost my place upon the floor, as speaking to a privileged question, if the resolution had then been put in and gone upon the Calendar. I am forced to a certain extent to speak upon what I think is the forthcoming statement of facts. So far as I know, so far as I have been able to learn from the public press, no steps to prosecute criminally whatsoever have been taken, although one year and ten months have expired. So far as I know, the men who are at the head of the Department of Justice and the other Executive Departments of this Government know as well as I know and know as well as you know that any mere suing out of injunctions and any mere fines are not going to stop men of this sort. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I desire to say this, that I think, so far as that is concerned, that the very basic line of our common law is unjust and unequal and wrong in one respect. I do not believe that any offense in the world ought to be punished by a fine or imprisonment, because a fine of $10 for a man who is working for $5 a week is an enormous punishment, while a fine of $10 for a man who is working for $5,000 a year or month or week is no punishment at all. I believe that in all criminal statutes the punishment ought to be by fine and imprisonment or by imprisonment alone. Amongst a democratic people this is advisable, so that there may be equality of punishment for all criminals, rich and poor alike. But in this particular case these people, although if they have been prosecuted they have gotten off with a fine and escaped imprisonment, were still not prosecuted. All that was done was to sue out to a successful termination this injunction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that when we get a reply it will not be the reply given last year to substantially this same resolution. Last year this resolution came out of the Committee on the Judiciary and passed this House and was sent to the Attorney-General, and the answer came back that it was "incompatible with public policy" to send the information. I left it there. I did not address the House. I followed the matter no further, because I thought that, being so soon after the decision of the court in the Northern Securities case, perhaps they did not want to tell what they had ready to produce as evidence against these people, but now a year and ten months have expired, and soon the period of limitation will have attached a bar to prosecution under the act itself, and it is time that the legislative power which enacts law should know from the executive power which executes the law whether the law as written, ita lex scripta, has been executed; whether any steps have been taken to execute it, and, if so, what steps? It is impossible now to say truthfully that it is incompatible with public policy to tell us the truth. I hope when the reply comes that it will show that the public has not known what was going on and that the executive authority has been taking steps, or that the executive authority contemplates taking steps to punish what the Supreme Court calls "more than a contract, an offense," a crime against the laws of the land. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield back to the gentleman from Wisconsin such time as he has given me. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would not occupy one moment of the time of the House replying to the remarks of the learned gentleman from Mississippi were it not for the fact I do not think the gentleman from Mississippi clearly understands the question before the House, and from the further fact that I think the gentleman from Mississippi intended, or has by his remarks, cast some reflection upon the President and upon the Attorney-General. There is no question but what the Supreme Court of the United States held that the contract in the so-called "Northern Securities Company case" came within the condemnation if the statute of 1890, but that is not the question here. This resolution simply asks the Attorney-General as to whether or not he has prosecuted criminally any parties interested in that contract. Now, a glance at the book here before me containing the case discloses that the statute of limitation ran a long time ago upon any criminal procedure, long before the present Attorney-General took upon himself the discharge of his duties. Never having conferred with the Attorney-General, and never having conferred with the President of the United States, I am unable to disclose whether any criminal prosecutions were contemplated under the statute, but I can very readily see that it was very proper, and in the interest, I think, of the people, and of the saving of time and money that no criminal proceedings were had in that case, and I think the President and Attorney-General have done their full duty. It is useless to spend time denying that the Supreme Court of the United States has said that that contract fell within the condemnation of that statute, but, Mr. Speaker, it must be borne in mind that the Supreme Court divided on that question. Four judges said the contract did not fall within the condemnation of that statute, and I want to say for the benefit of my friend from Mississippi that three of those judges were Democrats—Democrats when they were appointed on the bench, were Democrats when they made that decision, and I suppose are Democrats to-day. They were Mr. Justice White, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, and Mr. Justice Peckham, able and distinguished jurists.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for one moment?

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman will admit the very nonpartisan character of the decision reenforces the position which I took.

Mr. JENKINS. No; I do not so appreciate it, and I want to call the attention of the House to the facts in this case. I want them to understand the case was decided by a bare majority of that court and that was in a civil proceeding. The Government accomplished, by the issuing of the injunction and by the decision of the court, all that they wanted. That is, they wanted to destroy the contract that these companies had entered into. Unquestionably, when you read this case and examine the contract you will become satisfied that the contract was drawn by very able and distinguished counsel, and undoubtedly these gentlemen would come into court and say they operated under the advice of counsel, and I think this would be a proper case for them to say that they did not intend to violate the law, but sought most excellent advice before having that contract drawn. Now, the law simply provides that certain contracts should be a nullity and those entering into those contracts should be punished. There is no question about that. There are gentlemen who say there was no intention on the part of those gentlemen who made this contract to violate any law, that undoubtedly they were advised they could safely have that contract drawn, and entered into it, and their judgment was sustained by four members upon the Supreme bench.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was the intention of the Judiciary Committee to submit this resolution to the Attorney-General for his answer and reply, and, as I say, we can not anticipate what answer the Attorney-General will give to this House; but it must be borne in mind that long before he came into his office the statute of limitations had run, and it would be useless for him to prosecute, and we can not anticipate what his predecessor would have said were his reasons for not bringing criminal prosecutions. But I am satisfied that by not bringing the criminal proceedings it had a tendency to save a large amount of money and a large amount of valuable time, because the time of the legal department of this Government is fully taken up and there is no opportunity there to waste any time, and we certainly do not want them to waste any money. But it will be time enough for us to discuss this question when the report of the Attorney-General comes in and when he has told this House in his own language he did not institute criminal proceedings.

How much time does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] desire?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not wish as much time as I did before the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] spoke. I think ten minutes will be quite sufficient.

Mr. JENKINS. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it is well to get right at what this resolution is, and when we have done so we can doubtless be prepared to appreciate how little there is in the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that pertains in any way to the resolution pending before the House. Ordinarily a Member of Congress who believes that he has an interrogatory to put to a Cabinet officer that will bring out some facts upon which he can base a criticism, waits until the information has been brought to the House, and then attacks the report or the purpose of the Administration. But I suppose the gentleman from Mississippi, knowing exactly what there was in this matter, wisely concluded that the only opportunity that we would have to make an assault upon the President and the Attorney-General would be to do it upon the question of agreeing to this resolution——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROSVENOR. And assuming a lot of facts that do not exist, so far as we know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the gentleman well aware of the fact that I several days ago asked unanimous consent to take precisely the course that he is now talking about, and that objection was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that I asked of the House that the privilege to discuss the question, after reply from the Attorney-General, should be granted me by unanimous consent, instead of being forced to discuss it before the reply had come in, and that the request for unanimous consent was objected to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] did ask the opportunity to make a speech at some time upon some subject—not when any bill or resolution was before the House, but to make a speech—and I did object, and I shall always continue to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the record will bear me out in that my request was to discuss this particular question—not "some question"—upon the return of the answer of the Attorney-General.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of no importance to me. My point is well taken. The gentleman is undertaking to assume a condition that he can not state to the public exists, and then proceeds to make a speech about it.

Now, what is it that this resolution seeks, and what will be a complete answer? I am going to show you the only answer that can with any propriety be given by the Attorney-General. The gentleman undertakes now to say that he was going to wait for some facts to come from the Attorney-General. What facts? The facts that he asked for in the resolution or some other facts that he did not ask for in the resolution? Let us see what exactly he asks for and what exactly will be a complete and exhaustive answer to his whole tirade here. This resolution states:

> That the Attorney-General is requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the House whether any criminal prosecutions have been instituted by the Department of Justice against the individuals or corporations which were adjudged recently by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Northern Securities case, to be guilty of having violated the laws of the United States by entering into unlawful combinations in restrain of interstate commerce.

Then he asks, and that this part has been stricken out by the committee:

> And send to the House all papers and documents and other information bearing upon any prosecution inaugurated or about to be inaugurated in that behalf.

Now then, what will be the answer? It will be a complete answer. I will undertake to say any other answer than the one I am going to make would be an impertinence to this House and to the country and the violation of the proprieties of the office. Will the Attorney-General say to the Speaker of the House?

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of resolution so and so, and in answer thereto, to say that no criminal prosecution has been begun."

Now, there is the whole of it; and out of that a speech, bitter and far-reaching in the position assumed by the speaker, has been made here this afternoon; and that is the whole of it. He has not asked to give the Attorney-General an opportunity to say anything. He has narrowed the Attorney-General down to the bare question, the bare answer, "There has been no criminal prosecution begun." That is all. And then we have it—and burnings and bad verdicts by juries, abuse of small children, horrors upon horrors accumulate; they tread upon each other's heels so swift they come in the imagination of the gentleman, because somebody was not prosecuted in the Northern Securities case after a complete bar of the statute had been created by lapse of time.

Why, Mr. Speaker, is there any lawyer in this House or in the country that believes that, waiving the statute of limitation, there is any jury on earth, not even excepting the Omaha jury of infamous memory, not excepting that jury, do you believe there is any jury on earth would have convicted either one of these men under an indictment alleging violation of the Sherman Act? It would have been puerile upon the part of the prosecuting officers.

I do not know what the Attorney-General will offer, nor do I care; I know enough to know that in the case of a question of civil contract that stood and was being operated for years under the advice of some of the ablest lawyers in the United States of America, that contract when they got it into the Supreme Court was held to be illegal by a vote of five to four, and three or four Democrats on the bench. If there had been two more Democrats then my friend would have been compelled to hold it to be upright and honest. [Laughter.] For the Democrats took the old Democratic doctrine and held that contract was a legal contract; and they are very able men. Would the gentleman from Mississippi hesitate to go into a contract in a matter of a mere business transaction if Justice White told him that it was absolutely legal and right; and if he did get into such a contract, is there any jury in Mississippi that would convict him and send him to the penitentiary?

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, that is the whole of this transaction, and I trust that the Attorney-General will make such a response to this interrogatory as will teach the gentleman that he must put his resolution of inquiry in a little better shape than to simply narrow the question down so as to be able to say to the people of the country, "Look at that! Here is the Attorney-General. I wanted him to tell me all about the Northern Securities case, and here he comes back at me and simply says so and so, and that is an evasion and that is going to produce fire, bloodshed, and anarchy and trouble all over the United States."

I believe if there ever was a conscientious man on the face of the earth it was Knox when he filed his petition or his declaration upon which this adjudication took place. I believe that one of the wisest statements ever made by an Attorney-General was when he gave notice to the people of the country that a foundation had been laid now, a construction had at last by a bare majority been given to the Sherman antitrust law; and from this time forward there must be no more violations of that statute. When he said, "We do not intend to run amuck," he might have been more choice possibly in the selection of the language, but he intended to say to the people of the country, "We have reached this conclusion: We know now what the law is, although we are not quite certain that it will always be upheld. But it is enough to have rendered a judgment in this particular case, and we are not going to hunt around over this country to see how many men we are going to send to the penitentiary."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio will never reach that stage when he is not ready to defend anything that smacks of being connected, however remotely, with a Republican Administration, and he will never lose his adroitness in undertaking the task. The gentleman says that one who introduces a resolution here generally waits until he gets the information demanded in order to discuss it. There is not a Member of the House who does not know that if a gentleman does wait he loses his privilege of discussing it at all, except that he may fulminate in the air when there is time, upon a general appropriation bill, but can not speak to the subject-matter itself when the subject-matter is before the House. In a word, everything he has to say loses its force.

The gentleman says that there will be "only one answer," and he gives that answer, to be made to this resolution. I ask you to mark the answer. The answer that he has given is this: The Attorney-General is to say, according to him, "Mr. Speaker, your inquiry of a certain number received; I reply, no criminal prosecution has been undertaken."

Perhaps the expectation of that sort of reply was my object in offering the resolution. Perhaps I wanted a Republican Attorney-General, under a Republican Administration, plainly to confess to the American people that no steps had been taken in order to prosecute these people. I remember the old Scriptural phrase, "Out of their own mouths shall they be judged;" and I always find it well to get a sufficiency of things out of a fellow's own mouth to judge him, rather than to have to judge him by my own assertions as to what he has done or left undone.

The gentleman says, ex cathedra, that no jury on earth would have found these men—Pierpont Morgan and Hill—guilty. My assertion ex cathedra is as good as his, and I will put it against his, and I will say that no honest jury in the United States would have failed to find a verdict on the facts in this case. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nobody but a set of lawyers on the bench, quibbling about technicalities and not about facts, would have failed to agree unanimously about the matter. They were disagreeing about law, not about facts. The whole dissenting opinion—being that of the minority of the bench—is based upon the idea that these facts which I have outlined, being confessed, did not come under the antitrust law, because there was not an "unreasonable" restraint of commerce, and the majority decided that any restraint was violative of the law, and moreover decided that this was an unreasonable restraint, except one judge who, passing upon the reasonableness or unreasonableness of it, said that it was an unreasonable restraint.

The gentleman says that I offer this resolution because this prosecution is barred. I did not know until a moment ago that it was, if it is; but I do know this, that it was not barred within quite a long time after the decision of the Supreme Court in the Northern Securities case, and unless I am woefully mistaken—and if I am the gentleman from Wisconsin will correct me—it was not barred at the time the former resolution was offered by me in the last Congress and passed by this House.

Why, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] tells us that what the Northern Securities case amounts to is this: A paternal injunction upon the part of the court and of the Government that "there must be no more violations of the antitrust act." Does the gentleman know with whom he is dealing? Does he suppose a mild injunction to that effect is going to have any effect upon these people? Does he presume that a fine, unless it is large enough to go to their millions of fortune, will have any effect upon them? Does he believe it is right for the Executive so to execute the laws as to make a decision of the Supreme Court construing an act of Congress, and consequently the act of Congress of itself, amount to nothing more save only an injunction that you "must not any more violate the antitrust laws?"

My God, Mr. Speaker, if that is all it meant, it fell hurtless at the feet of these people and of their kind all over this country. Are they violating the antitrust law any less since the Northern Securities decision was pronounced than they were violating it before? Is there a man of common sense within the sound of my voice who does not know there is a steel trust, who does not know there is a glass trust, who does not know there is a tobacco trust, who does not know there is a beef trust? This poor, miserable criminal—this degenerate Pat Crowe—who, as I said a moment ago, acted in this fiendish way toward a little child—and the greatest crime that can be perpetrated in this world is a crime against a woman or a child, against somebody who is helpless, against somebody who is tied around with our very heart strings—even this fellow plausibly defended himself the other day by saying that Cudahy, the beef-trust man, was contending that a confession he made to the attorney-general ought not to be used against him in evidence, and that therefore a confession that he, Crowe, had made in the case of abducting his (Cudahy's) child ought not to be used against him in evidence.

Has your mild injunction, "You must not any more violate the antitrust laws;" the promise, "We are not going to run amuck, but you must quit it;" "I do not want to hurt you, but it must stop," has all that had any effect, and if so, upon whom?

The gentleman from Ohio, with all his experience, with all his ingenuity, can not answer "upon whom" it has had any effect. He can not give the name of a single party in the United States engaged in conspiracy and combination in restraint of trade, engaged in attempting to monopolize commerce, upon whom that decision has had the slightest deterrent effect.

When they contributed to the Republican campaign fund in the last Presidential campaign, they either knew they were safe, or else "bought their peace."

From all I can learn that decision has had no effect whatever upon the parties except to make them change the form of their violation. The last I had heard of it they had not returned to the original parties—the Northern Pacific Railroad and the Great Northern Railroad stockholders—the stock that had been put into this holding company, and for all practical purposes the whole thing is now under one management and one operation. Smart lawyers amply paid can evade an injunction at any time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am sure the gentleman from Mississippi does not want to predicate an argument upon erroneous facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Ohio would be the last man to say that I did.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the gentleman will find, on investigation, that all the stock, bonds, and everything else connected with the merger have been given back.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said that the last I heard of it they had not been. I have not kept up with the thing down to this very date. If done, how long ago was it done?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it was but a short time ago when it was finally closed up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I thought—a very short time, if at all. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would have much preferred to take the course indicated by the gentleman from Ohio. I would have preferred to hear from the Administration before speaking. I said so to the House the other day. I said I hated to take it for granted that there has been no prosecution until I heard from the Attorney-General himself that there had been none. The gentleman from Ohio tells me that all that anxiety growing out of the fear of doing injustice to the Administration—a fear which I always entertain with regard to anybody I am talking about—he tells me that all that fear is futile and useless. He tells me beforehand that the Attorney-General will make reply "that no prosecution has been undertaken." Perhaps he will also make reply that he is now barred from beginning a prosecution, but that will not account for the fact that action was not taken when the prosecution was not barred. That will not remove the responsibility from the door of the Administration. [Applause].

Mr. JENKINS. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment reported by the committee has been adopted. If so, I will ask for a vote on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. PROCTOR. I should be glad to have the Senator from Colorado give some explanation of this matter. I have been receiving for a good many years letters in regard to salaries due postmasters upon former accounts in Vermont. The query I wish to make is, If there is any justice in the claim, why should it not apply to the whole country and not to one State alone?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose, perhaps, it ought, in justice, to apply generally, but we have an unusually large number of these claims from the State of Colorado, owing to the fact that the population increased so rapidly that many postmasters were compelled to advance money. These are accounts which have already been audited in the Auditor's office. I have no objection if the Senator wants to cover other States, but I would a little rather that he would allow the resolution to pass, and then submit one for the claims in Vermont.

Mr. PROCTOR. I make no objection to the resolution. I merely wanted an explanation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY.

PRINTING OF TOPICAL INDEX RELATIVE TO FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CLAPP submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 copies of the Topical Index to the Twelve Annual Reports of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, to the Secretary of the Interior; 200 copies for the use of the Senate, 300 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow at the close of the routine business, subject to the pending notice of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], I shall submit some remarks upon House bill 12987, being the bill proposing to amend the act regulating interstate commerce.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I dislike the practice of giving such a notice, but it seems to be generally in vogue, and consequently I will give one.

I desire to say that on Monday the 12th, with the permission of the Senate, I will submit some remarks on the rate bill. If that bill should be the order of business on that day, I would be glad, with the courtesy of the Senate, to make what remarks I shall upon the bill in that order. If it shall not be the order of business on that day I would be glad to speak immediately after the expiration of the routine morning business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can only say, for the information of the Senator from Texas, that, of course, the Senate itself will determine what shall be the regular business, but that I shall endeavor to have the rate bill taken up as soon as the statehood bill is voted on. So I hope the Senator will have a chance to speak on the bill itself.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. DUBOIS were appointed.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army. The bill was passed February 5 last, and the following day by unanimous consent was replaced upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I understand the bill is now before the Senate and subject to amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The bill was engrossed and read the third time, of course.

Mr. HALE. And that vote has not been reconsidered?

Mr. LODGE. No; only the vote on the passage of the bill was reconsidered. There are always two votes, the vote on ordering to a third reading, and the vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. And after a bill is ordered to be engrossed for a third reading it is not open to amendment. So if the Senator desires to offer an amendment he must ask that the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and was read the third time be reconsidered.

Mr. HALE. There will be no objection to that, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and read the third time will be reconsidered. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this bill, to what it will lead to, and that it is a part of the general programme of the General Staff of the Army for an increase of the Army in every direction. There are bills, copies of which I have here, that have already been introduced, covering an increase in almost every one of the different corps or branches of the Army, recommended by the General Staff. This is one of them. There is one for the Ordnance Corps, which slipped through in my absence, or I should have then called the attention of the Senate to it. But it has gone to the House, and is there being considered.

I want the Senate, before this bill passes, to understand fully that it is one of a series of measures perfected by the General Staff to increase the present Army of the United States. Instead of putting it in a general bill, which I presume would have been rejected at once by the Senate, the attack is made in detail, and this is the first one that has come before the Senate for discussion.

I am bound to say that I do not believe in the present condition of the country and its revenues, and, in view of the general considerations touching this question, there is any call for an increase of the Regular Army. It is a body of 60,000 men. We fixed the limit only a few years ago. But there is one body of men, Mr. President, who will never rest contented until the Army is increased. It is not the Secretary of War, although he transmits the reports, but it is the General Staff, the board of military men who have taken charge of the War Department, so far as its administration in a military way goes, and have made their recommendations.

I wish to have the Secretary read, because it will show better than I can in detail, a statement, including this bill and all the other bills, all to the same point, the increase of the Army, under the several bills that have been submitted. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it, in the absence of objection.

Mr. WARREN. What is the statement? Who made it?

Mr. HALE. As the Senator will see, it is a statement of the different bills which have been presented.

The Secretary read as follows:

IMPORTANT BILLS SENT TO CONGRESS BY SECRETARY TAFT.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1906.

Secretary Taft to-day sent to Congress drafts of several important bills designed to increase the efficiency of the Army. The bills were introduced by Representative HULL, chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs.

One of these measures provides for a separation of the field from the coast artillery, retaining the corps organization for the latter. The coast artillery is increased by officers and men necessary for the torpedo defenses of the harbors, and an attempt is made by increase of pay to remedy the present impossibility of retaining highly trained men. The bill provides for greater flexibility in the companies of coast artillery. The field artillery is increased by six batteries, and regimental organization is given to it. The total increase in both arms provided for is 5,000 men, and the estimated cost for the first year is $2,000,000. In addition there will be an estimated expense of $5,500,000 for barracks, gun sheds, etc., to cover a period of five years.

Another bill is designed to provide a partial reserve for coast defense in case of actual or impending war. The bill provides for a force of not to exceed 50,000 men, who will have served not less than one complete enlistment in the Regular Army. They are to be enlisted for five-year terms, and to be carried on the rolls of the Military Secretary's Office, to be allowed to live where they please in the United States, but to be subject to call by the President for ten days of each year for instruction, and on the outbreak of a foreign war to be called into active service. Secretary Taft explains that the bill provides means of enabling the President to comply with the act of February 2, 1901, to increase the Army to 100,000 men in case of an emergency. The total cost is estimated at about $2,000,000 a year. The Secretary says:

"The necessity for a reserve of trained men was shown at the outbreak of the Spanish war, when it was found to be impossible to secure men for the Regular Army who had had previous training, which necessitated regiments going into battle at their peace strength. The purpose of the bill is simply to have available a trained force to bring the Regular Army to the strength now authorized by law, which would practically double its efficiency, and the annual increased expenditure for that purpose would be only about 3 per cent of the present cost of the permanent military establishment."

Another bill provides for increasing the efficiency of Army bands, both in number of members and the scale of pay. The Secretary says the present scale of the playing members of the military band runs from $13 to $22 a month, which is utterly inadequate to secure and keep competent musicians.

The Secretary strongly urges the passage of a bill increasing the pay of noncommissioned officers in accordance with the principles followed in the armies of all other great powers.

One bill provides for a system of retirement by selection with a view to promote advancement. The bill provides that should the average number of vacancies in each grade from all causes from colonel down to first lieutenant be less than a certain per cent of the total number of officers in the grade next below, additional vacancies to bring the total to the required number shall be provided, according to the Secretary, "by weeding out the least efficient officers." The Secretary adds:

"It seeks to provide a remedy for a condition of affairs in the cavalry, infantry, and artillery bad now, but certain to become intolerable unless a cure is applied. That condition is the result of stagnation in promotion, combined with the unavoidable failure in practice of retiring and examining boards to remedy the evil."

Other bills the passage of which the Secretary advocates provide for the organization of a service corps of 7,000 men attached to the Subsistence Department of the Army for the performance of work heretofore performed by soldiers; for the reorganization of the veterinary corps of the Army; to extend the special leave privileges to certain instructors and student officers at service schools; to authorize commissions to issue in the case of officers retired with increased rank; to provide the noncommissioned officers necessary for duty at various recruiting stations, and to provide for promotions to fill vacancies by detail of officers below the grade of brigadier-general to the General Staff and by the detail of officers to the Military Academy, on recruiting service, etc.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, what has just been read by the Secretary discloses the purpose of the General Staff. I refer to that body, because all of these movements in the direction of increasing the military establishment have root in that body. I make this statement because, while it is well known to Senators who are on certain committees, I doubt if all Senators are aware of the existence in the War Department of a distinctive military body that assumes control of all military legislation connected with the Army.

The General Staff consists of four general officers, four colonels, six lieutenant-colonels, twelve majors, and twenty captains, taken from the different corps of the Army and assembled together in a series of rooms in the War Department considering questions of war. It is a body of forty-six men. I find—and we get enlightenment as we investigate into the proposed legislation—that the General Staff, that has to deal with an Army of 60,000 men, is comporting itself after the fashion of the general staff of European powers. Germany, with an army of from seven hundred thousand to eight or nine hundred thousand men, has a general staff, and the general staff has subdivided itself into three grand divisions. Dealing, as it necessarily must, surrounded by neighbors, by rival states, with their hands at each others' throats, there is necessity in Europe for a general staff, for it subdividing itself into grand divisions, and taking charge of that immense force, which at any time may be used either to hurl against a neighboring power or for defense in case of invasion.

But the General Staff here, consisting of forty-six officers, who are discussing questions of war, has reported, as the papers in this case show, though I did not know it before, in the last report I saw—they report generally to the President, not to the Secretary of War—a plan for sending 18,000 men to invade China. I am not going into the question now, because luckily the Secretary of State is "sitting upon the lid," and we are not likely to have war.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It occurred to me as having a sort of humorous aspect if the Secretary of State is "sitting on the lid" and the Secretary of War is trying to pry it off, that the Secretary of War, being the larger man, that lid will go up. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. They are both very great men.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not speaking about the mentality of the men. Of course, I have the very highest admiration for the Secretary of State and a very fine feeling of friendship for the Secretary of War, but if one was "sitting on the lid" and the other was trying to get it off I was rather inclined to think that Mr. Taft would succeed.

Mr. HALE. I should be entirely willing to trust this matter of contemplated war—but I am not going to discuss that, and only mention it incidentally—with the Secretary of War, although he transmits this report of the General Staff; but the fact is that the General Staff has taken upon itself the entire military authority in the War Department.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that staff responsible for these stories in the newspapers about troops being sent to the Philippines to be in readiness to invade China?

Mr. HALE. I do not know how many troops have been sent there; but I am inclined to think that several thousand have been sent there, and that the purpose of the General Staff is that they may be used, if an emergency either arises or can be made, to invade China; which, of course, would be a declaration of war while Congress is in session.

Mr. TILLMAN. That would be without Congress permitting or ordering it.

Mr. HALE. Well, the Senator and I have views about that; but that point is not involved in this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. But that is part of the subject. The Senator spoke of the work of the General Staff, its preparations for war, and the active efforts that are being made to get us into war. I thought that was what the Senator was alluding to. I did not want to draw him from his line of argument, but it just occurred to me that this is a very important matter and that the country ought to have the fullest light on it.

Mr. HALE. That is my only object. It is a thankless task, after a committee has reported a bill, to oppose it and to ask the intervention of the Senate; but it is so grave a situation that I have felt that this project, which is a part of the General Staff plan for increasing the Army, should be understood by the Senate before it passes the bill.

I find, Mr. President, that by the act approved February 2, 1901—five years ago—entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the present military establishment of the United States," the different corps of the Army, and particularly the Medical Corps, were taken into consideration; and five years ago Congress fixed the limit of the Medical Corps. It cut it down, but fixed the limit in the act to increase the efficiency of the Army.

I wish the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who sits near me, when I read the provision fixing the size or proportion of the Medical Corps of the Army in the bill which we passed for the military service only five years ago, whilst I read the numbers that were then fixed for the Medical Department will read the corresponding provisions in the pending bill. That law provided—

That the Medical Department shall consist of one Surgeon-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; eight assistant surgeons-general, with the rank of colonel—

Now, will the Senator from New Hampshire state the number of colonels provided for in this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Sixteen.

Mr. HALE. Against eight in the law—twelve deputy surgeons-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel—

Mr. GALLINGER. In the pending bill twenty-four lieutenant-colonels are provided for.

Mr. HALE. That would be an increase of twelve—sixty surgeons, with the rank of major—

Mr. GALLINGER. In the pending bill 110 of that rank are provided for.

Mr. HALE. That is an increase of fifty.

Two hundred and forty assistant surgeons with the rank of captain or first lieutenant.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the pending bill the number of captains and first lieutenants with that rank is fixed at 300.

Mr. HALE. I thank the Senator for enabling me to bring in this manner before the Senate the underlying provisions of this bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Maine wishes to complete his statement of what is provided in the present law, he should add that the present law provides for the employment of contract surgeons, and that there have been employed on an average nearly 200, and there are 170 employed to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. One hundred and ninety-five.

Mr. WARREN. The present law was not satisfactory to the Medical Department at the time it passed nor to members of the Military Committee which had the matter under consideration; but was the result, as is the case with many other laws, of a compromise and getting only a part of what was necessary, as experience has proven. There are over 170 contract surgeons constantly employed in order to take care of the Army now, in time of peace.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has anticipated what to me is one of the most objectionable features of this bill. We have provided for the military establishment heretofore and for the Medical Department by a flexible, adjustable, and temporary force of contract surgeons. In any emergency under the present act, the head of the Department, the President primarily, or the head of the Medical Corps, can employ more or less contract surgeons. That, as I have said, was intended to be a temporary force, a flexible force, that could be lessened or increased at any time. It is a force that is not borne on the rolls of the Army as a permanent force, and this bill, under the claim of decreasing the number of contract surgeons, has included them all in the provision for additional captains and lieutenants.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course the Senator does not mean that. The bill does not so provide.

Mr. HALE. I take it the purpose of the bill is to decrease the number of contract surgeons, but, instead of that, it increases the rank of the medical officers of the Army.

Mr. WARREN. It decreases the expense by $200 a year in the case of each one of the younger surgeons who takes the place of a contract surgeon.

Mr. President, just a moment, if the Senator from Maine will permit me.

Mr. HALE. Certainly. What I want is discussion of this bill.

Mr. WARREN. When the bill passes, if it does, there will still be in time of war or in case of a sudden call an opportunity and a necessity to employ contract surgeons or those from the reserve force, but the bill is based upon the theory that it is a bad practice in time of peace, when we have a minimum force, to rely so largely upon contract surgeons. The bill provides that nearly the number of surgeons that will be necessary shall be continuously employed, and the expense, as I said before, is lessened at one end of the line and increased at the other; but the total expense of the Medical Corps is not increased at the present time, and will not be largely increased when four years from now, if the bill passes, the maximum number of surgeons may be reached.

Mr. HALE. The serious fault with this is that it disposes of the contract surgeons, who can be reduced at any time we pass the bill providing for the Army. Instead of that it is proposed to add these officers to the regular establishment, who are a part of the Army and who receive retired pay. I do not find that the committee have taken any account of that. The contract surgeon is only a temporary appointment and employment. He is not on the Army rolls with retired pay when he arrives at a certain age; but the substitution, which the Senator says does not increase the expense, utterly ignores the fact that when the military establishment is increased, instead of the contract surgeon it is burdened—or not to use the word "burdened"—there is added a corps of officers who have the retired pay, and the increase in years to come, instead of, as the Senator says, being only a few thousand dollars, will be hundreds of thousands of dollars, and what was a good feature in the law which we passed only five years ago of an adjustable force of contract surgeons, which may be a hundred at one time or 150 at another time, is removed, destroyed, and a permanent force is substituted which has every privilege of the rank of officers in the Navy and receive the retired pay. That in itself, Mr. President, ought to give the Senate pause before it passes such a bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I do not agree with the Senator that the contract-surgeon provision, which Congress adopted after full consideration, is a bad feature. It is a very good feature.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator believe that this system of contract surgeons is better than that of regularly commissioned officers?

Mr. HALE. With a large force in other branches, which has been increased, which we fixed five years ago, with a large force of the Medical Corps of the Army, with only a small number of troops, 60,000, the contract-surgeon provision is one of the best features of the military establishment.

Mr. WARREN. Has that system been adopted in the Navy, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. HALE. I am glad the Senator anticipates me about the contract surgeons. I was coming to that. As the Senator has called my attention to it, I will show, I think, that there is no analogy between the Army and the Navy. The Navy within ten years has been more than quadrupled in its force, while the Army has been cut down. There is no analogy between the two. Where we had three or four battle ships and one or two armored cruisers six years ago, at the time that law was passed, we have got now building and soon to be launched twenty-eight battle ships and twenty armored cruisers. When it is said, as it is by Army officers and by the general board, that that situation is analogous to that of the Navy it is precisely the contrary. There is no comparison to be instituted as to the medical force for a department that has been more than quadrupled in six years as contrasted with another department that has been reduced.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator in that connection what relation the increase of battle ships has to the retired list? The Senator makes the point that this Army proposition does not cost the same because of the retired officers, yet the officers of the Navy are retired and on retired pay, as well as those of the Army.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but there is no proposition of increase in that regard.

Mr. WARREN. There has been an increase heretofore, and that increase in the Navy is proportionately more than the proposed increase for the Army by this bill.

Mr. HALE. There is an increase of the men to man the ships.

Mr. WARREN. But there has been an increase in the Medical Corps of the Navy, and of the higher officers as well as of the lower.

Mr. HALE. It is nothing whatever as compared with this.

Mr. WARREN. This bill—I beg to correct the Senator—stands lower in percentage and proportion than the Navy allowance, as the total will show in comparison.

Mr. HALE. That is a question as to the size of the two establishments. The size of the Navy is enormous when we think that we have twenty-eight battle ships and twenty big armored cruisers, to say nothing of the protected cruisers, scouts, torpedo-boat destroyers, and all that. It is a very great and immense military machine. I say again that no comparison can be instituted between the increase of the naval establishment as contrasted with the Army establishment.

Mr. WARREN. Of course we understand the battle ships are not subject to medical treatment. The surgeons and doctors are to care for men and not ships, the same on sea as on land.

Mr. HALE. The battle ships absorb a large number of medical officers. Every battle ship that is launched and is sent upon the waters of the world takes up a great number of officers. The increase is one of the things that follow the immense increase of the establishment. Congress is not increasing the Army; there is no reason why it should be increasing the Army. There is no peril; there is no reason why now, in a time of profound peace, with nobody interfering with us, we should this year set afoot a scheme for the general increase of the Army of the United States. It has been put in one bill, but I do not think it will ever see daylight in this Senate.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator well knows that I have not been one of those who favor a large Army. When the bill for the reorganization and increase of the Army was before the Senate, I voted against it, and did what else I could to prevent the increase which was then made. The increase, however, has been made, and we have an Army which requires a certain amount of attention from the medical officers. I make that statement preliminary to an inquiry which I desire to propound to the Senator. Recognizing the fact that a certain number of medical officers are required, the disposition of my mind is that, so far as the absolute requirement for the existing force is concerned,

It should consist of regularly commissioned officers, rather than contract surgeons. I recognize the truth of the statement made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the provision with reference to contract surgeons was intended to be an elastic provision, by which, in times of necessity or emergency, an increased force of medical officers could be readily obtained under existing law without any further legislation.

Recognizing that, the inquiry I desire to make of the Senator from Maine is this: We have had, as he has said, six years of peace, and we are now in a condition of peace. Does the Senator desire—I ask this for information, and not in the way of argument, for I desire to know what the proposition is—does the Senator desire that, so far as the regular force is concerned, having no reference to emergency where there may be an increased force, but so far as the existing force is concerned, does the Senator intend to be understood as favoring contract surgeons for the service required by that existing force rather than by regularly commissioned surgeons?

Mr. HALE. When I consider the question of expense, which we ought to consider, and when I realize that the contract surgeons' force is an elastic force, to be increased or diminished, that it is only temporary and does not have retired pay, does not add to the immense weight of the retired pay of the military establishment, I am very clearly in favor of the present arrangement, which seems to work without any trouble that I know of—we have had for six years more or less use for the military in our possessions in the Philippine Islands, and I have never heard that the contract-surgeon provision, which brings bright young men for the time who are willing to be employed as contract surgeons, and which gives them experience in surgery—I have never heard that the Army has been crippled. Therefore, in answer to the Senator's question, I will say that I think that the present arrangement is a better one than it would be to substitute for the contract surgeons an iron-clad list of so many officers of the Army who are permanent, and who can retire and get retired pay. Right here I should like to call the Senate's attention—because I do not think that that is realized by the country or by the Senate—to the enormous burden of the retired list, both of the Army and of the Navy.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. HALE. I do not want to increase that list. Now, I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. So far as the medical force has reference to service which would be required in case of an emergency—in other words, service which would be required for a force in addition to the regular force—I quite agree with the Senator that it is better to have a provision for contract surgeons rather than to have a regular establishment, which, for the purpose of meeting emergencies, would be larger than would be required for a time of peace—the ordinary establishment. Now, if the Senator will pardon me just a second further——

Mr. WARREN. That is just what this bill does.

Mr. BACON. That is the question on which, as my friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] says, I wish to have light—whether or not this bill proposes to make a permanent organization for the regular establishment, with a regular ascertained force and with the corresponding opportunity for the ascertainment of the number of regular surgeons who may be required, or whether it provides a larger medical corps than the regular establishment requires and is intended to make provision for anticipated increase in time of emergency.

Now, if it is true that the bill only provides such regular medical officers as will be required and as are now required for the regular establishment, I would prefer to have regular officers, even with the burden of retired pay, rather than to have contract surgeons.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. But, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, if it is a corps of officers greater than is required for the regular establishment and is provided in anticipation of time of emergency, I should then prefer, of course, that that should be provided for by the contract-surgeon arrangement. I understand, though, from the statement of the Senator from Wyoming that this bill still leaves in force the law with reference to contract surgeons with a view to the employment of contract surgeons to meet emergencies when an increase over the regular establishment may be required.

Mr. WARREN. The bill does more than that. It provides for a reserve corps, the members of which receive no pay except when called into service, but each candidate must pass a regular examination and be certified up so as to be eligible for employment in case of emergency.

Mr. BACON. Are they contract surgeons?

Mr. WARREN. They would be under pay as regular officers for the time their services were rendered, but entitled to no retirement pay and no privileges beyond those of contract surgeons, except that they would have regular rank.

Mr. HALE. Luckily, Mr. President, the documents in the case, furnished by the General Staff, give a complete answer to the question of the Senator from Georgia. And, first, if it is not intended to substitute for the present arrangement an increased force—not the present, but an increased force—of officers, why are the 8 colonels increased to 16? We have got along with 8. Why are the 12 lieutenant-colonels increased to 24? Why are the 60 majors increased to 110? Why are the 240 captains and first lieutenants increased to 300?

Now, referring to the very question the Senator from Georgia has asked, whether any of this increase is needed, I say the answer is in what I have just indicated, that we have got on very well since five years ago we passed the bill to increase the efficiency of the Army and the Medical Corps; and that is a demonstration that these additional officers are not needed. But we are not left to that. The Lieutenant-General, the Chief of Staff before the present one, General Chaffee—iron-grim old soldier—has made his comment on this bill:

> I have personally to remark that in my opinion the bill as drawn will greatly increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps. It is true it does not give so great a flow of promotion to the ranks of colonel and lieutenant-colonel as is desired by the Surgeon-General—

There was a controversy between the Surgeon-General and the General Staff, and the Secretary, on this matter of colonels and lieutenant-colonels, adopted the plan of the General Staff—

> but it does give early rank for majors and lieutenants, who are, in fact, the men generally employed for duty with troops, colonels and lieutenant-colonels being more generally administrative officers. For this purpose the number of colonels and lieutenant-colonels provided for in the bill seems to me ample for peace administration and for reasonable requirements in war for an army of 250,000 men.

That is the horizon of the General Staff. That is the outer circle of the needs of the Army. He does not stop there.

> We have now employed in the service nearly 200 contract physicians, and if this bill should pass it is believed that in a few years—that is, when the corps shall be entirely reorganized under the bill—contract surgeons can be dispensed with and our medical system in the Army made very much more efficient than it is to-day.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me at this point to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The statement there is that there are 200 contract surgeons. The Senator has read the increased number of officers of different rank that there will be. What is the total increased number of officers provided for in this bill?

Mr. HALE. It has been read here, and I have added it up, but——

Mr. BACON. The Senator has read how many generals there would be, and how many lieutenant-colonels there would be, and how many majors there would be, but I want to know the total number of officers, with a view to comparing it with the number of contract surgeons.

Mr. HALE. There are 8 colonels, 12 lieutenant-colonels, 60 majors, and 60 captains and first lieutenants.

Mr. GALLINGER. Three hundred captains.

Mr. HALE. Three hundred captains.

Mr. WARREN. Two hundred and forty captains and first lieutenants.

Mr. HALE. Yes; 240.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. What is the total increase in the number of officers contemplated by this bill over the number of commissioned officers now in the Army?

Mr. WARREN. A hundred and thirty.

Mr. BACON. And there are 230 contract surgeons?

Mr. WARREN. At the present time a hundred and seventy-odd.

Mr. BACON. In other words, there are some forty-odd less——

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Than are now employed, constituting the Medical Corps, both of regular officers and of contract surgeons?

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. HALE. You can not fix the number of contract surgeons except for the day or the month or for the time being. It is an adjustable force. It is 150 at one time, because they are needed; it is 165 at another, perhaps 200, or even more, and therefore you have nothing to come and go on as to the permanency of the contract force. That is the merit of the force.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator if he has the information whether there has been at any time within the past six years as small a number as 130 contract surgeons in employment?

Mr. WARREN. May I answer the question? I think the number to-day is the minimum.

I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, who believes so thoroughly in contract surgeons—I believe in them myself in time of war—if he believes the Navy ought to change its system, reduce the number of its officers and employ a corps of contract surgeons instead; and whether he, as chairman of the Naval Committee, has made any move toward bringing about that result?

Mr. HALE. There is no analogy between the Navy, made up of war ships, and a military force stationed at a hundred different places on land.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to know why.

Mr. HALE. For this reason—I was about to state it.

Mr. WARREN. I was going to say, I do not understand why a man can not be employed under contract as a surgeon on a ship as well as on land.

Mr. HALE. The battle ship when fitted out has to have a permanent outfit for her cruise. It may be for three years. She has to have a complete outfit of officers. It is very large. You take a battle ship and begin with the captain and the different lieutenants, the men performing engineer duty, the medical corps, the pay corps, the chaplain, perhaps, and you have to have that entire force for a cruise of three years.

Mr. WARREN. Why is it not as easy to contract for a cruise of three years as for a term of one year?

Mr. HALE. You will find it very much more difficult.

Mr. WARREN. There is no more difficulty in contracting for three years than for one. Experience has shown that.

Mr. HALE. Yes; there is a great deal more. There are a great many bright young medical men who will go into the Army for the benefit of the year's experience they will get in an emergency, and the advance they are given in the line of surgery, who would never agree for a moment to go on a battle ship for three years before they return home.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator hire contract surgeons for a year, sending them under large expense to the Philippine Islands and return, and think it was a matter of economy?

Mr. HALE. We have gotten along very well in the Philippines, so far as this force goes. I have heard no complaint. We have largely employed contract surgeons. I think most of them wanted to come home, and a good many of them lost their health and will never again be well men. Yes; as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] suggests to me, not only the contract surgeons, but the regular surgeons. They all want to come home after a short time.

But the Senator, I say again, should bear in mind that there is no comparison between the actual operation of the Navy and the Army. The Army is disposed of on land at a hundred different stations, and it is easily approachable. The term of service may be very short; while, as I said before, one of the very worst features of the pending bill is that which provides for an additional number of permanent officers and a retired list. That is one of the bad features of this bill.

In looking up the matter I have had occasion to read the debates in another body, and they are very illuminating about the retired list. We have retired more brigadier-generals in the Army in the last three years than we ever before retired after the immense, colossal wars we have been engaged in; and I do not want to see the retired list increased anywhere. I do not object to the officers of the Army and the Navy in reasonable numbers, the size of the establishment being fixed in a conservative fashion, having the benefit of retired pay. It is a very great inducement to military service in both the Army and the Navy that at the age of 62 or 64, as the case may be, instead of a man being thrown out to take his chances as he does in the vocations of peace, he is retired with three-quarters of the pay he has been drawing as an active officer. I do not object to that. That is a part of the military system, and a fitting part. But it is a curious development of the present situation that we are to-day retiring officers both of the Army and the Navy, at a more rapid rate than we did after the great wars we have been engaged in. The list of retired naval officers—retired admirals and rear-admirals—has got to be something enormous. If the debate continues another day, or is not ended now, I may present a list I have of the number of major-generals and brigadier-generals already on the retired list, which this bill proposes to increase; and it is something startling. The number of brigadier-generals and major-generals—I have not the figures here now——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not mean to maintain that this bill increases the retired list directly? The Senator knows better than anybody, because he was the able champion here of a bill to retire officers of the Navy at one grade higher than that to which they were entitled, because of civil war service, that the retired list was greatly increased. The Congress did the same for the Army, and for that reason there is at the present time a large list of brigadier-generals. There are not many retired major-generals. There is a very large list of admirals of the Navy retired. But, unfortunately, in the course of events, the number will grow less and less from day to day by the death of these veterans who gave the best of their lives to preserve the Union.

Mr. HALE. The increase does not come from the civil war—not by any means. That was forty years ago. The increase comes under the present practice of pushing men up—as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] suggests to me—for a day.

Mr. WARREN. They are all civil war men.

Mr. HALE. They may have been in the civil war, but the civil war did not develop any such system as has been developed forty years after the civil war. Officers are pushed up, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, for a day, and then retired, and somebody else is pushed up and retired. Nothing of the kind was ever done until within the last few years and, perhaps, few months. The list of major-generals is large. There are more than the Senator from Wyoming thinks there are. It is a very large number.

Mr. WARREN. There is a very small number of major-generals on the retired list—less than a score in number.

Mr. HALE. Compared with brigadier-generals, undoubtedly. And now I say again that when, as is shown here, it is proposed to be rid of contract surgeons, and to have this regular ironclad list of officers, who are a part of the establishment, who get retired pay, which contract surgeons do not get, it is not directly an increase of the retired list—it is directly an increase of the retired list; and when you put on 130 new officers, you establish, just as certainly as the tides and the sunrise come, that when those officers reach a certain age they are entitled to be retired on three-fourths pay, and the contract surgeon is not. As I said, the contract surgeons constitute a flexible force, and it is the best force, and we have got on so well with it that I do not want to see it changed.

I find, in looking over this document, which has been furnished from the General Staff, that Gen. Leonard Wood, a good soldier, a good officer, an active fighting man, who has been out in the Philippines, says:

> The Medical Department should be large enough to enable the Army in case of expansion to have regular medical officers in reasonable numbers throughout the entire force.

That is the purpose—that the Medical Corps, that part of the general service, shall now be enlarged and expanded with a view of what will be its necessities in time of emergency; and we are asked not here, but in the other bills to which I have alluded, to adopt the same programme.

The Senator from Wyoming is a frank man, and I do not quite understand why it is not admitted that this is to be an increase, and that it is better that there should be an increase, and that we should have an increase of the Army now because at some time or other we may have a war. That is what it means.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has made that statement, or statements similar to it, several times. If I permitted it to pass, I would tacitly give assent to it. I dissent entirely from that view as to this bill. All we ask the Senate to do is to treat this bill on its own merits without reference to the other staff bills.

The Senator has alluded to a number of bills that have been introduced in the House and in the Senate. They have not been reported here.

Mr. HALE. Some of them have been.

Mr. WARREN. None that increase expenses. Of the number that the Senator alluded to this morning or read the list of, not a single one has come out of the committee which increases by one penny the expenses of the Government. The present one is not included. It is a bill which has passed here before. The present bill does not provide for an increase of the Army to 200,000. It may give at the head officers enough to organize a force if called upon for 200,000 men, but it does no more than provide the working force of the present Army. It does not increase the number under pay at the present time or that have been under pay.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. What is the record of the Medical Department of the Army as to the general efficiency of the contract surgeons? Has it been unsatisfactory?

Mr. WARREN. It has been both satisfactory and unsatisfactory. There is no disposition to cast reflections upon contract surgeons. There is this, however: There is the expense of transporting those men in the beginning and closing of their term, which does not follow with the regular officers of the Army. There is, of course, a constant danger of losing the best of the contract surgeons wherever and whenever they find better places to practice their profession than in the Army. Where they receive $1,800 per year it does not take very much of a town or place to offer better inducements for a competent surgeon and physician than under his contract with the Army.

I do not wish to inveigh against contract surgeons as such, but the point I make is that in order to secure men with the proper talent and ambition to follow their profession and to take into consideration the future we should make them regular officers up to the minimum number that everyday peace-basis Army uses may require, and we should depend upon contract surgeons only for such extra temporary force as we may need from time to time.

Mr. SPOONER. I have known some—not many—but I have known among contract surgeons some gifted young men, men who had graduated with credit——

Mr. WARREN. May I say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. May I say there is no kind of trouble in time of war about getting competent surgeons for temporary work? There are then men patriotic enough, no matter what they may be earning at home, to volunteer and go out as contract surgeons; but in times of dry and unexciting peace they are not so anxious to get into the service of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. I beg your pardon.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SPOONER. Always.

Mr. PETTUS. Has the Senator from Maine concluded his remarks?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, it is a prudent thing at least to learn wisdom from the conduct and acts of others. That wisdom which we get by experience is terribly expensive. Now, ordinarily we have not given that attention to the medical branch of the Army which it deserves. Mr. President, the history of the wars of the last two or three hundred years shows that where one man is killed by a bullet four men die of disease, and they die of diseases which can be prevented if sufficient care be taken. It is altogether a mistaken idea to pass by the medical branch of the Army as an unimportant affair.

I desire, in illustration of what I have been saying, to read a few extracts from a recent book written by Surgeon Seaman, who went through the Japanese war and through the hospitals and studied this subject on the ground. The Japanese prepared for sickness as well as for the fighting branch. They had studied the history of the world. They knew how many died of sickness; and they produced a most marvelous result. Whereas in other wars, in the wars of the United States as well as the wars of other countries, four men died of disease where there was one killed by a bullet or died of wounds, in the war between Japan and Russia only one died of disease where four died of bullets or died of wounds.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me? Fourteen died of disease where one died by bullets in our Spanish war.

Mr. PETTUS. I have the figures before me. I do not think I am mistaken.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. PETTUS. While I am on this subject I will give the figures: Killed and died of wounds, fifty-two thousand and odd; died of all diseases, 11,000.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was reading from another article and about another war. He is correct.

Mr. PETTUS. I am reading about the Japanese war, and these are the official figures, as the author states.

Now, just think of the enormity of the thing! One died of wounds and four died of disease; and that is the history of the wars of the last two hundred years. It was not quite so bad in all our wars, but is was approximately so.

In this case 52,946 were killed and died of wounds, and 11,992 died from diseases. As I said, though, I propose to read a few extracts from this book:

> The success of Japan in the recent conflict with Russia is due preeminently to three fundamental causes: First, thorough preparation and organization for war, such preparation as was never made before; second, to the simple, nonirritating, and easily digested rations of the Japanese troops; and, third, to the brilliant part played by the members of the medical profession in the application of practical sanitation and the stamping out of preventable diseases in the army, thereby saving its units for the legitimate purposes of war—the smashing of the enemy in the field.
> It must never be forgotten that in every great campaign an army faces two enemies—the armed forces of the opposing foe, with his various machines for human destruction, who is met at intervals in open battle, and the hidden foe, always found lurking in every camp, the grim specter, ever present, that gathers its victims while the soldier slumbers in hospital, in barrack, or bivouac—the far greater and silent foe, disease.
> Of these enemies, the history of warfare for centuries has proven that in prolonged campaigns the first, or open enemy, kills 20 per cent of the total mortality in the conflict, whilst the second, or silent enemy, kills 80 per cent. In other words, out of every 100 men who fall in war 20 die from bullets or wounds, while 80 perish from disease, most of which is preventable. This dreadful and unnecessary sacrifice of life, especially in conflicts between the Anglo-Saxon races, is the most ghastly proposition of modern war, and the Japanese have gone a long way toward conquering or eliminating it.
> Without minimizing for a moment the splendor of her victories on land or sea—Mukden, Port Arthur, Liaoyang, and the Korean Straits, of which two are among the bloodiest battles in history—I yet unhesitatingly assert that the greatest conquests of Japan have been in the humanities of war, in the stopping of the needless sacrifice of life through preventable disease.
> Longmore's tables, which are accepted as the most reliable statistics of war, and which are based on the records of battles for the past two hundred years, show that there rarely has been a conflict of any great duration in which at least four men have not perished from disease to every one from bullets. * * *

Mr. President, this author goes on to show how this was done:

> All of these statistics were studied with the minutest care and detail by the Japanese. Their authorities recognized that in order to be victorious over a foe like Russia this great, silent enemy that slaughters eighty out of every hundred that fall must be overcome. And the following startling figures recording losses from February, 1904, to May, 1905, since which time there have been no great battles, show to what a splendid degree they were successful.

Here is the table which I read, in substance. I will read it again:

|---|---|
| Killed and died from wounds | 52,946 |
| Died from all diseases | 11,992 |

Now, I want to show you one of the great instrumentalities by which this was done. The Senator from Maine complained of rank, of too much rank, especially to these medical officers.

> She—
> Japan—
> organized her medical department on broad, generous lines, and gave its representatives—

The Senator will please listen—> gave its representatives the rank and power their great responsibilities merit, recognizing that they had to deal with a foe that kills 80 per cent of the total mortality. She even had the temerity (strange as it may seem to an English or American army official) to grade her medical men as high as the officers of the line who combat the emeny that kills only 20 per cent, and to accord them equal authority, except, of course, in the emergency of battle, when all authority devolves, as it should, on the officers of the line.

Mr. President, surely we can get a lesson from that history of what was done in Japan. We all know the horrors of disease in war. I had a little experience once myself. I was an officer of a regiment that was ordered from Mobile to Knoxville in February, 1862, and it made the trip. It was a regiment of about 900 or 1,000 men, and the trip cost 200 men, who died of disease within a few days after that trip was accomplished. Why? The precautions necessary, and the precautions medical men would take if they could have their way, would have saved those 200 men. They traveled in open cars from Mobile to Knoxville, with the snow falling on them most of the way; they had just recovered from long attacks of measles, and the 200 men died of disease in about ten days. But that is just a personal matter. These figures that I have read about from the authorities show the immense importance of having the Medical Corps of the Army of the United States composed of a sufficient number, whatever that number may be. I have heard no complaint of the number. It is the rank that seems to offend.

Mr. President, those wise men, taking precautions to fight the supposed greatest land force in the world, gave their medical officers the same rank they gave the officers of the line, and they ought to have it. If they can change the ratio of those who die of wounds and those who die of disease, as the Japanese can change it, how do they do it? They do it by the wisdom they get from their medical books, in the first place, and their experience in treating diseases, and they get it by reason of their rank, their authority in the army; and they ought to have it.

Almost all prudent men prepare for war in time of peace. If we are ever to have another war I want to profit by the wisdom of these Japanese, and have the medical officers not only numerous enough, but of important rank in the field as well as in time of peace. They ought to have this rank. There is not a man who served a month in an army who does not know the vast importance of rank so far as it gives efficiency to a man in an army.

Right here in the Government in time of peace rank is of the utmost importance to give effect. What is the doctor worth if he is a contract doctor and if he is paid $1,800 or $2,000 a year? What can he do to change the administration where he sees wrong going on? Inquiry is made at once, "Who is this man?" "He is a surgeon employed by the Government; they give him almost as much as they do a lot of clerks; they pay him $1,800 or $2,000." Every man of us ought to know that rank is of the utmost importance to successful operation in the control of men.

A contract surgeon has no right—no legal right, I am talking about, and no right according to the usages of society—to associate with the officers of the Army. When he does so it is by their courtesy. He is not recognized as the social equal of them.

How can he, then, a man who has no right of social intercourse with the officers of the Army, influence them and produce a change? He can have his ideas, which may be the wisest possible, but how is he to influence the conduct of the management of the Army, the preparation for the events that are to take place? They listen to him, and some wise officer may gather some idea from him that would be useful, but here the very man who is to save the 80 per cent of the Army of those who are to die is not even on a social equality with one of the cadets who will graduate next June at West Point. You put him down on his personal merits and the gentlemanly conduct of the officers of the Army. There is where he stands. He has no official rights at all. Men who are intrusted with this high duty ought to have rank and they ought to have enough of commanding rank. The Senator from Maine says we have too much rank.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. House bill 12707, the statehood bill.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] will address the Senate on the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator from Kansas is ready to go on with his speech, as he gave notice. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] having the floor upon the pending measure, I wish to give notice that I shall endeavor to call it up immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Kansas. This course, I understand, to be agreeable to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. It is entirely agreeable to me.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4229) to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, which were as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the words "disposed of," strike out the words "as hereinafter provided" and insert in lieu thereof "under the general mining laws of the United States."

Also, page 2, line 14, after the word "entry," insert "under the provisions of the homestead law."

Also, page 2, line 15, after the word "value," insert "in addition to the fees and commissions now prescribed by law for the disposition of lands of the value of $1.25 per acre."

Also, page 3, line 19, after the word "acre," insert "And provided also, That if the State of Washington has made any selections under existing law in lieu of sections 16 and 36 of the lands affected by this act the acreage of such selections shall be deducted from the acreage to be paid for under the preceding proviso."

Strike out all after the word "price," in line 14. Strike out all the remainder of the section.

Page 4, strike out all of section 5 and renumber the succeeding sections.

Page 4, line 23, after the word "proceeds," insert "not including fees and commissions."

On page 5, line 11, after the words "thrashing machine," insert the word "others."

Insert a new section to stand as section 12, to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That if any of the lands of said diminished Colville Indian Reservation can be included in any feasible irrigation project under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to withhold said lands from disposition under this act and to dispose of them under the said reclamation act, and the charges provided for by said reclamation act shall be in addition to the appraised value of said lands fixed as hereinbefore provided and shall be paid in annual installments as required under the said reclamation act, and the amounts to be paid for the land, according to appraisement, shall be credited to the fund herein established for the benefit of the Colville Indians."

Mr. PILES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs present.

Mr. PILES. This is agreeable to him.

Mr. DUBOIS. These amendments seem to be quite important. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that he either ask for a conference or that the bill be withheld until the chairman is present.

Mr. PILES. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that the amendments are entirely satisfactory to the chairman of the committee. As a matter of fact——

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to look over the amendments. They seem to be very important, and I do not think we should accept the House amendments without considering them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments will lie on the table for the persent.

Mr. PILES subsequently said: Mr. President, I am informed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] that after an examination of the amendments made by the other House to the bill (S. 4229) to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, he has no further objection, and I therefore move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 956) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the district of Alaska.

Mr. NELSON. The amendment is in the form of a substitute, which is quite lengthy, and it is unnecessary to read it. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. NELSON, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. PATTERSON were appointed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, after the morning business is finished, it is my purpose to submit some remarks upon House bill 12987, known as the "rate bill."

POSTAGE ON CERTAIN PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me for a moment.

I had intended this morning to call up Senate resolution No. 82, instructing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to ascertain and determine if construction of Post-Office Department as to meaning of the law as to postage on certain publications of alumni of colleges as second-class matter, etc., is correct, etc., and ask the Senate to dispose of it; but the measure in charge of the Senator from Wyoming was taken up, and it consumed the morning hour. I observe that all the morning hours are to be absorbed by speeches of which notice have been given up to Tuesday. I shall ask the Senate on Wednesday of next week, after the routine business, to permit me to call up the resolution and submit some remarks upon it, and I hope to have it then disposed of.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a very short bill, which is considered quite important, if the Senator from Kansas will kindly yield to me.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3433) to amend an act entitled "An act to divide the judicial district of North Dakota," approved April 26, 1890.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, in line 1, page 3, section 3, to strike out the word "April" and insert "March;" in line 2, page 3, section 3, to strike out the word "first" and insert "second;" in line 3, page 3, section 3, to strike out the word "December" and insert "November;" in line 4, page 3, section 3, to strike out the word "February" and insert "July;" in line 5, page 3, section 3, to strike out the word "April" and insert "October;" in line 7, page 4, section 5, to strike out the word "April" and insert "March;" in line 8, page 4, section 5, to strike out the word "first" and insert "second;" in lines 8 and 9, on page 4, section 5, to strike out the word "December" and insert "November;" in line 10, page 4, section 5, to strike out the word "February" and insert "July;" and in line 11, page 4, section 5, to strike out the word "April" and insert "October;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to divide the judicial district of North Dakota," approved April 26, 1890, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That the State of North Dakota shall constitute one judicial district.

"SEC. 2. That for the purpose of holding terms of the district court said district shall be divided into five divisions, to be known as the southwestern, southeastern, northeastern, northwestern, and western divisions. That portion of the State comprising the present counties of Burleigh, Stutsman, Logan, McIntosh, Emmons, Kidder, Foster, Wells, McLean, and all the territory in said State of North Dakota lying west of the Missouri River and south of the twelfth standard parallel shall constitute the southwestern division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Bismarck. That portion of the State comprising the present counties of Cass, Richland, Barnes, Dickey, Sargent, Lamoure, Ransom, Griggs, and Steele shall constitute the southeastern division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Fargo. That portion of the State comprising the present counties of Grand Forks, Traill, Walsh, Pembina, Cavalier, and Nelson shall constitute the northeastern division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Grand Forks. That portion of the State comprising the present counties of Ramsey, Eddy, Benson, Towner, Rolette, Bottineau, Pierce, and McHenry shall constitute the northwestern division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Devils Lake. That portion of the State comprising the present counties of Ward and Williams and all that territory lying west of the Missouri River and north of the twelfth standard parallel in the State of North Dakota shall constitute the western division, the court for which shall be held at the city of Minot.

"SEC. 3. That the terms of the district court for the district of North Dakota shall be held at Bismarck on the first Tuesday in March in each year; at Fargo on the third Tuesday in May in each year; at Grand Forks on the second Tuesday in November in each year; at Devils Lake on the first Tuesday in July in each year, and at Minot on the second Tuesday in October in each year. And the provisions of law now existing for the holding of said court on the first Monday in April and November of each year is hereby repealed, and all suits, prosecutions and processes, recognizances, bail bonds, and other proceedings of whatever nature pending in or returnable to said court on the days last named are hereby transferred to and shall be made returnable to and have force in the said respective terms provided in this act in the same manner and with the same effect as they would have had had this act not been passed.

"SEC. 4. All issues of fact in civil causes triable in any of the said courts shall be tried in the division where the defendant or one of the defendants reside, unless by consent of both parties the case shall be removed to some other division.

When the circuit court or district court is held, as provided in this act, at the same time and place, one grand and one petit jury only shall be summoned and serve in both said courts.

"SEC. 6. The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, my interest in this bill is mainly in that part relating to statehood for Oklahoma and Indian Territory. I am acquainted with the people who live in the proposed State of Oklahoma and know the injustice that has been done them by the denial of their repeated petitions for statehood. Three Congresses have had this subject under consideration. It has consumed more time in those Congresses than any other one subject. Three years ago, in the Fifty-seventh Congress, a bill passed the House of Representatives providing for statehood for Oklahoma, with a provision that later on Indian Territory should be attached to the proposed State. That bill failed to become a law. In the next Congress a bill passed the House of Representatives providing for statehood for Oklahoma and Indian Territory. That bill also passed the Senate, but failed in conference.

The bill under consideration has passed the House of Representatives. It is pending here. The people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory are entitled to statehood. They were entitled to it three years ago; they were entitled to it one year ago, and a crime has been committed against them. It is a crime to deny the number of people living within the boundaries of the proposed State the privilege of being admitted into the sisterhood of States.

In the admission of new States three elements are properly taken into consideration—first, the area; second, the population, and third, the resources, developed and undeveloped. So far as area is concerned, the boundaries of the proposed State are ample. The area will be somewhat smaller than either Kansas or Nebraska, but larger than Arkansas or Iowa, being about the size of Missouri.

So far as population is concerned, there are more people living there than have been denied admission in any other Territory or than have been admitted in any State since the organization of the Government. The governor of Oklahoma, in his last annual report, estimates that on the 30th of last June there were not less than 800,000 people in Oklahoma.

The Indian inspector for the Five Civilized Tribes estimated that on the same date there were not less than 700,000 people in Indian Territory. The Bureau of the Census, in its estimate of population of all the States and Territories for the year 1905, placed the number of people in Oklahoma and Indian Territory at 1,056,261. Comparing the population of Oklahoma and Indian Territory with the population of States, taking not the estimates of the governor of Oklahoma and the Indian inspector, but the estimate of the Bureau of the Census on the population of these Territories, and the same estimate as to the States, we find that the combined population of Oklahoma and Indian Territory last year was within 100,000 of the combined population of the following States: Delaware, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Utah, and Vermont. These six States are entitled to send twelve Senators to this body, and yet the petition of Oklahoma and Indian Territory to send two Senators has been repeatedly denied by Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask whether the Senator bases his statement upon the population of those six States under the last census, or whether he gives them the benefit of the growth for which he has given credit to the Territories mentioned?

Mr. LONG. I endeavored to make it plain, but evidently did not. I take the estimate of the Bureau of the Census for last year on Oklahoma and Indian Territory and compare it with the estimate for the same year on the six States to which I have referred.

Mr. HEYBURN. The estimate for the present population?

Mr. LONG. The estimate for the population of last year, 1905. Taking these estimates, we find that the population of this proposed State is equal to the population of Montana, New Hampshire, and Oregon combined. It is greater than the population of North Dakota and South Dakota combined. It is nearly twice the population of the State of Washington. It is half again as large as Maine.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. I should like to correct the Senator. I understood the Senator to say that the population of Indian Territory and Oklahoma was twice that of the State of Washington. The State of Washington to-day has more than a million people. I think that is generally admitted by those who are familiar with the conditions prevailing in that State.

Mr. LONG. I do not know to what estimate the Senator refers regarding the population of Washington. I am taking the estimate of the Bureau of the Census. These comparisons are not made for the purpose of showing that the States that are in the Union are not entitled to statehood, nor are they intended as a reflection on those States, but the purpose is to show that in Oklahoma and Indian Territory there are over a million people, according to the estimate of the Bureau of the Census, and over a million and a half according to the estimates of the governor of Oklahoma and the Indian inspector for the Five Civilized Tribes, who are entitled, on population, to be admitted as a State. It is nearly four times the population of Montana; it is larger than the population of any New England State, except Massachusetts. This much as to population.

Oklahoma alone in the election of Delegate to Congress in 1904 cast 109,145 votes. This was greater than the total vote cast in any one of the following eighteen States:

Alabama, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont, and Wyoming.

I have given the vote of Oklahoma alone. It is impossible to determine the number of votes in Indian Territory, but the committee that reported this bill gives the same number of delegates in the constitutional convention to Indian Territory that is given to Oklahoma, and it is fair to assume, and I believe, that the population of Indian Territory is practically equal to that of Oklahoma. So if 109,145 votes were cast in Oklahoma in 1904, it is reasonable to conclude that there is that number in Indian Territory. The census of 1900 gave 109,191 males of voting age in Oklahoma and 97,361 in Indian Territory.

The vote of Oklahoma Territory was 30,000 in excess of the total vote combined of the States of Nevada, Vermont, and Wyoming. It was 7,000 votes more than the State of Utah cast at the same election.

When we consider the resources of this proposed State, the comparisons are equally impressive. Taking the showing of the Crop Reporters of the Department of Agriculture for December, 1905, and February, 1906, we find that the total live-stock values for Oklahoma are $63,163,787; for Indian Territory, $28,456,936, or a total for the proposed State of $91,620,723. The total live-stock valuation for the proposed State of Oklahoma is greater than that of the States of Idaho, Nevada, Utah, and Vermont combined; it is almost exactly that of North and South Carolina combined; it is $12,000,000 greater than the live-stock valuation for South Dakota, and almost twice that of North Dakota. It is equal to that of Wyoming and Montana combined, with four millions to spare. It is about 55 per cent of Kansas.

The total value of farm products for Oklahoma is $29,379,428; for Indian Territory, $28,666,684, or a total of $58,046,112. The farm products of the proposed State of Oklahoma are $17,000,000 greater than those of North Carolina; within $5,000,000 of those of North Carolina and South Carolina combined; almost equal to those of South Dakota, and about $7,000,000 greater than those of Montana, South Carolina, Vermont, and Wyoming combined. They are about 40 per cent of Kansas, and nearly twice those of Idaho, Nevada, and Utah combined.

The proposed State of Oklahoma is not a manufacturing State; but, in this respect, we find the statistics are equally as astounding. The increase in manufactures is very great.

From the report on manufactures of the Bureau of the Census for 1905 we find that the manufactures in Indian Territory amounted to 466 establishments, with a capital of $5,016,654.

Manufactures in Oklahoma amounted to 341 establishments, with a capital of $8,645,325.

This is a total of 807 establishments and a capital of $13,661,979.

The capital of the combined establishments for the proposed State of Oklahoma is nine times that of South Dakota; six times that of North Dakota; over twice the combined States of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Nevada: very near the total for Montana; $1,000,000 more than Utah; one-half of Kansas, and one-fourth of Colorado.

It should be borne in mind that the proposed State of Oklahoma is not a manufacturing State by any means, yet its capital for manufactures is about one-third that of Rhode Island; about one-sixth that of Connecticut.

From 1900 to 1905 the percentage of increase in capital for manufactures in Oklahoma was 351, and in Indian Territory 215. The percentage of increase in establishments in Oklahoma was 108, and in Indian Territory 160. The percentage of increase in value of products in Oklahoma was 200, and in Indian Territory 201. This was not equaled by any State in the Union, although the entire West made great gains over the showing made by the Twelfth Census.

The same abundant resources are shown by the national banks in Oklahoma and Indian Territory. From the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year ending October, 1905, it appears that Oklahoma has 114 national banks, and Indian Territory 142, or a total of 256. The capital stock of Oklahoma banks—national—is $3,955,000, and of Indian Territory $5,730,680, or a total for the proposed State of Oklahoma of $9,685,680.

The capital stock of national banks for the proposed State of Oklahoma is nearly as great as that of Kansas; nearly three times that of North Dakota; four times that of South Dakota; twenty-four times that of Nevada; over seven times that of Idaho; over nine times that of Wyoming; within a million and a half dollars of the combined capital stock of the States of Vermont and New Hampshire; 50 per cent greater than that of the two Carolinas; nearly $2,000,000 greater than that of the combined capital stock of Nevada, Idaho, Wyoming, and Utah; just about the same as North Carolina, South Carolina, and North Dakota combined; and three times that of South Dakota, with a million dollars to spare.

The number of national banks in the proposed State of Oklahoma is within five of the total number of the States of Nevada, Idaho, Wyoming, Vermont, New Hampshire, and South Carolina. It is more than the number in North Dakota and South Dakota, and within forty-three of the number in Kansas.

From the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the year ended June 30, 1905, it appears that Oklahoma has 57 Presidential post-offices; Indian Territory has 52, or a total of 109 for the proposed State of Oklahoma.

Receipts from Oklahoma offices, Presidential, were $425,320; from Indian Territory, $283,127; or a total of $708,447.

Receipts from the offices in the proposed State of Oklahoma were within about $100,000 of those from the combined offices of North Dakota and South Dakota; exceeded the States of Utah, Idaho, and Nevada combined; were nearly double those of Montana; double those of Utah; over $100,000 greater than those of Mississippi; practically the same as Oregon, and more than $200,000 in excess of South Carolina.

I have referred to the area, population, and developed resources of the proposed State. It is unnecessary to refer to the undeveloped resources of Oklahoma and Indian Territory. The abundant deposits of coal in Indian Territory, with gas, oil, timber, and stone, coupled with the great agricultural possibilities of Oklahoma will make it a great Commonwealth from the very day that it is admitted into the Union, if such good fortune shall ever come to its people.

The question is naturally asked, Why, with all these resources, are a million and a half of people denied statehood? Why is it that a million and a half of people, who are entitled under the ratio of apportionment to eight Members of Congress—this bill giving them five—why is it that so many people are denied admission as a State? It is due to the fact that, unfortunately, the case of Oklahoma and Indian Territory has never been considered alone by Congress; it is due to the fact that there have been controversies between the Senate and the House of Representatives on the part of the bill not relating to Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

This bill has passed the House of Representatives and is pending here. These controversies are again renewed, and amendments are pending which, if adopted, will have the effect of renewing the contest between the House and the Senate, and will again imperil, if they do not defeat, this legislation.

There are three amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], either of which will, in my opinion, if adopted imperil the enactment of this bill into a law.

The first amendment is to strike out all that part of the bill relating to New Mexico and Arizona. I am opposed to this amendment for the reason that I am in favor of statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. I believe that the people of those Territories, if they so desire, should have the privilege of being admitted as a State; and I believe that an opportunity should be given them to vote upon the proposition.

The second amendment provides that the ratification of the constitution when submitted shall only be made if a majority in each of the two Territories—that is, a majority in New Mexico and a majority in Arizona—shall vote for the proposition.

The third amendment is one providing for a special election, to be called within thirty days after the passage of this act, and the election is to be held on the twelfth Tuesday after the approval of the act, at which the question is to be submitted to the people of Arizona and New Mexico separately whether the people of these two Territories desire statehood under the provisions of this bill. It requires that a majority in New Mexico and a majority in Arizona must be cast for the proposition before that part of the bill relating to Arizona and New Mexico shall become effective; and if a majority of the vote in New Mexico or a majority of the vote in Arizona shall be cast against the proposition for statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, then that part of the bill is to be null and void.

I am opposed to either of these amendments for the reason that I believe it will surely imperil the passage of the bill, and also because I do not believe that it is just or right to submit the proposition, so that a majority in a section or a portion of the proposed State of Arizona shall have the power of nullifying the proposition of statehood for these Territories. Of course, if I were in favor of statehood for Arizona alone, if I believed that Arizona Territory was now or would be in future fit for statehood alone, I would support either of these amendments, hoping that if the proposition carried here it might be defeated in Arizona when it was submitted to the people of that Territory for their consideration. That is the purpose of this last amendment, and all who are in favor of or believe that statehood for Arizona is proper or that the people of that Territory are entitled as a matter of right to statehood will support these amendments.

I shall not detail the history of this proposed legislation, showing why, in my opinion, either of these amendments providing for a separate vote in Arizona will imperil the passage of this entire bill; but I will call attention to some of the reasons why this proposition is not fair and just to the people of Arizona and New Mexico.

There were, according to the election of 1904, 66,423 votes cast in the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. There were 23,431 votes cast in Arizona. Submitting this proposition in the ordinary way to all the people of Arizona and New Mexico, it would require a majority, if the same number of votes should be cast next time as were cast in 1904, of 66,423 votes in order to determine whether they desired statehood. That is the ordinary, usual way of submitting a proposition for statehood to the people of a proposed new State; but according to the method under which this is sought to be submitted 12,000 voters in Arizona can determine that there shall not be statehood, although there may be 54,000 votes cast in favor of the proposition. I do not believe that is fair. I do not believe it is just, and it is certainly unusual. Propositions of this kind have never before been submitted in this manner, and I do not believe that this should be submitted in this way.

It is an unfair proposition in other respects, and I wish to read a statement handed me by a gentleman who lives in the proposed State of Arizona and who fully understands the situation there:

The present amendment—

That is, the third one, providing for a special election—

The present amendment is unfair because it provides that before even the constitutional convention is called, and before any proceedings are taken under the statehood bill—in fact, before the bill is to have any affect at all—a special election is to be called in each of the Territories at which the sole question to be voted upon is to be whether or not the respective Territories care to enter statehood jointly.

Either of the amendments is very unfair, because Territorial lines are never permitted to hamper Congress in the creation of a new State. The argument that all of Arizona south of the Gila River should have a right to say whether it would come into statehood with the rest of Arizona or with the rest of Arizona and New Mexico combined would be considered untenable, yet the cases are exactly parallel. As well might it be argued that a single county ought to have the right to say whether or not it would come into statehood with the remaining counties of any Territory.

The fairest way to invoke a referendum as to a constitution under this proposed enabling act for New Mexico and Arizona is to submit the constitution and the State ticket to the people of both Territories as a whole, a majority of the total vote to govern. It is one State or no State, and therefore very inequitable to permit a portion of the people to decide the matter. Arizona has but one-third of the combined vote of the two Territories, and to permit Arizona alone to defeat the measure by a majority of its own votes is to say that one-sixth of the people of the proposed State may keep the other five-sixths in Territorialism indefinitely.

In the creation of new States, following the precedents of over a hundred years of our existence as a nation, the interests of two classes of people are involved. First, there are those who live in existing States and are represented in Congress by Senators and Representatives. They have a right to be heard. The people of those States have a right to say whether the people of a proposed State shall come in and bear the burdens and responsibilities of statehood and participate in the settlement of questions that concern that State, and also of questions that concern the nation.

The second class of people who have an interest are those who live within the boundaries of the proposed new State. They should be heard in determining the question whether they wish to come in and participate in the burdens and responsibilities of statehood.

There have been two methods followed in making new States. One method is for the people within certain boundaries voluntarily, without any legislative authority, to come together, elect delegates to a constitutional convention, make a constitution, submit that constitution to the people within the boundaries of the proposed State, and, if the people approve or ratify the constitution, then submit that constitution to Congress for ratification; and if ratified by Congress the State is admitted and its Representatives and Senators are admitted to Congress. That method has been followed in the admission of the following fourteen States: Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Maine, Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, Texas, Iowa, California, Kansas, Oregon, Idaho, and Wyoming.

There is another method, in which Congress takes the initiative and passes an enabling act, authorizing the people within the boundaries—Congress fixing the boundaries—of the proposed State to elect delegates to a constitutional convention, the delegates to make a constitution, Congress saying in advance, as we do in this bill, what shall and what shall not be put into the constitution. After the constitution is made it is to be submitted to the people for ratification. If ratified by a majority of all the votes cast within the proposed boundaries, the President issues a proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union. That method has been followed in the admission of the following eighteen States: Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota, West Virginia, Nevada, Nebraska, Colorado, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Washington, and Utah.

In both of these methods the consent of the people in the existing States is necessary, and also the consent of the people in the proposed State. When we speak of the consent of the people of the existing States, we do not mean the consent of all of them. Their consent is given, not by an election in all of the States, but by the votes of their representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives. And when we speak of the consent of the people in the proposed State we mean the consent of the majority of the people in the proposed State, the same as when we speak of the consent of the people of the existing States we mean a majority in the Senate and House of Representatives.

It has never been considered necessary that all the people in all the States should consent, but if a majority in the Senate and House of Representatives consent it is considered the consent of all, for in this country we have the rule of the majority. So when we submit it to the people of the Territory we do not mean that all the people must consent, but a majority of the people within the boundaries of the proposed new State.

It is very interesting to refer to the contests between Congress and the people of proposed States in regard to the formation of new States. From what we have heard in the progress of this debate, from letters we have received, from what has been said in the newspapers, one would think it is necessary to have the consent of all the people of a proposed new State before statehood should be granted to it. This has never been the policy of Congress. Congress has always followed the wishes of the majority, not the wishes of the majority of a part of the Territory proposed to be included within a new State, but the wishes of a majority of all the people within the boundaries of the proposed new State.

It is interesting to refer to the contest that was waged for years over the admission of Iowa. The first constitution in Iowa was made in 1840, and was defeated. A constitution was made in 1844, and rejected by less than a thousand votes. It was submitted a second time and again defeated, although the majority was cut down one-half.

These constitutions were made by the people voluntarily, without any consent or authority from Congress, no enabling act having been passed. But Congress in 1845 passed an enabling act, proposed certain boundaries for the new State, authorized the making of a constitution and its submission to the people. The boundaries were entirely different from the present State of Iowa, but those boundaries were rejected by the people at the polls—that is, a majority of the people of Iowa at that time voted against accepting those boundaries, and the proposition of Congress was rendered null and void.

The people voluntarily elected delegates to another constitutional convention, made another constitution, with the boundaries exactly similar to the present State of Iowa. It was submitted to the people of Iowa again in 1846, and there were 9,442 votes for it and 9,036 votes against it, or a majority of only 406 votes. And yet Congress, following the wishes and the will of the majority of the people of Iowa admitted the State, although there was a majority of only 406 in favor of the admission of the State.

Kansas, after repeated contests over the kind of constitution it should have, finally voluntarily made the Wyandotte constitution. It was submitted to the people. Of the 15,000 votes cast at that time, over a third were against the adoption of the constitution, but Congress followed the wishes of a majority of the people of Kansas, approved the constitution and admitted the State under the constitution which we have to-day.

Nebraska was admitted under a constitution for which there were cast 3,998 votes, with 3,898 against it, a majority of only a hundred, and yet the State was admitted under that constitution.

Oregon was admitted under a constitution against which over a third of the people had voted.

The first constitution of Wisconsin was rejected by the people; the second was ratified, although there were 6,149 votes against it. There were 16,442 votes cast for it.

Constitutions have always been submitted to all the people within the boundaries of the proposed State, and if a majority of the people within those boundaries, although a very small majority, favored the constitution, Congress has admitted the State under that constitution if it was satisfactory in other particulars.

Under the provisions of this bill, if it is enacted into law, we will proceed in the regular, usual method to submit the constitution to all of the people who live within the boundaries of the proposed State.

The claim was made a year ago in the debate—it is made now—that something unusual happened at the time Arizona was made a Territory; that there is a peculiar provision in the organic act of Arizona which ties the hands of Congress in making the boundaries of the proposed new State of Arizona; that this Congress has not a free hand in determining the boundaries of the proposed new State, but that those boundaries were made forty years ago when the Territory was organized. The Territorial act of Arizona contained the usual provision:

That nothing contained in the provisions of this act shall be construed to prohibit the Congress of the United States from dividing said Territory, or changing its boundaries in such manner and at such times as it may deem proper.

That is, Congress could divide Arizona into two Territories, or it could take part of it and attach it to New Mexico, and attach some of it to Nevada, or Utah, and no objection could be made because of this provision. But there was another provision in the organic act of Arizona which it is claimed to-day restricts Congress and makes it necessary, although parts of Arizona might be attached to other States or Territories to admit the State with the same boundaries that the Territory had when it was organized.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to ask the Senator a question for information. I perceive that he has with great care collected the precedents with reference to the admission of new States. The impression exists upon my mind that the new States admitted from time to time were carved out of larger Territories, as a rule. That impression may be erroneous. I should like to have the Senator cite a case where Congress has utterly destroyed one Territorial boundary and incorporated two Territories in one State.

Mr. LONG. I think the impression of the Senator from Montana is correct—that usually the States have been carved out of other territory. I think that is correct.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LONG. I have not yet answered the question of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I did not know but that the Senator had encountered a case where there was a union of two Territories. I did not recall such a case, and I thought possibly the Senator had.

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator will admit that we are dealing with a very unusual condition in Arizona and New Mexico. Its unusual character and nature are shown by the fact, as I shall show later on, that, notwithstanding a certain pledge made in a treaty with Mexico in 1848 and kept so far as all other portions of the territory are concerned, yet we have failed to keep it as to Arizona and New Mexico; and the failure to keep that pledge, notwithstanding the repeated efforts that have been made by both of these Territories to obtain admission as States, shows or must show to the Senator that we are dealing with unusual conditions; that there must be some inherent objections to the admission of these Territories as separate States, or Congress in all these years certainly would have carried out the pledge made in the treaty with Mexico; and if this is an unusual proceeding, it is because we are considering statehood for a people who are in a peculiar condition.

I will say to the Senator from Montana that this bill simply returns practically to the original Territory of New Mexico and admits that Territory as a State the same as that part of the bill which refers to Oklahoma and Indian Territory returns to the area comprised originally in Indian Territory. It is a reuniting of Territories which were separated, in the case of Indian Territory and Oklahoma, because of peculiar conditions, and a reuniting of two Territories, Arizona and New Mexico, which, in my opinion, were separated when they should not have been separated. It is my opinion that if the separation of these Territories had not taken place statehood would have been granted long ago to the people there, and the pledge made in the treaty with Mexico would have been carried out.

Mr. CARTER. I did not wish to deflect the Senator from the current of his remarks by the question I asked him. His proposition that this Congress is not bound by what Congress did in 1863 or at any other time of course is well taken and is not controverted. The act of Congress did not constitute a treaty with the people then living or who might thereafter live in either of the Territories. So I imagine we are not in any sense bound by what was done then. I mean bound in a legal sense—in a constitutional sense.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator believe we are bound in a moral sense?

Mr. CARTER. That presents an entirely different question; possibly a debatable question.

Mr. LONG. I merely want to say to the Senator from Montana that I have some letters and petitions asking me to oppose the union of Arizona and New Mexico on account of a certain provision contained in the act organizing the Territory of Arizona; and the memorial presented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] also contains similar statements, to which I will refer later on.

Now I will yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Kansas has cited instances where States have been admitted into the Union when almost an equal number of the people of the Territory were opposed, on a vote, to its admission. Does the Senator recall any instance where a Territory has been made a State against the protest of the people of the Territory?

Mr. LONG. What does the Senator mean by "the protest of the people of the Territory?"

Mr. DUBOIS. I can illustrate it by a little personal experience.

When I was urging the admission of Idaho into the Union of States, and Congress was very loath to grant us statehood on account of a provision in our constitution, a great many of my friends in Congress begged me to have it taken out. I announced that in my opinion Congress had no right to take us into the Union of States against our protest, and it would be against our protest if our constitution was amended.

Mr. LONG. What does the Senator mean—the protest of a majority or the protest of a minority?

Mr. DUBOIS. The protest of a majority.

Mr. LONG. There has been no instance, so far as I know, when the protest of a majority of the people at the polls was against admission that the State has been admitted.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator it is stated with great circumstantiality, and it is believed that a great majority of the people of Arizona object to statehood. Therefore why should we take them into the Union of States if that is so?

Mr. LONG. The question as to whether or not a majority living within the boundaries of the proposed State of Arizona are opposed to this measure will be determined at the polls. They will have the opportunity to express themselves on that proposition.

Mr. DUBOIS. How?

Mr. LONG. First in the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, and then in the ratification of the constitution when it is submitted to them. The proposition is to submit it in the usual way to all the people living within the boundaries of the proposed State of Arizona. If a majority of the people at the polls reject the constitution, of course the State of Arizona will not be admitted.

Mr. DUBOIS. But you add the whole population of New Mexico to the population of Arizona and allow them to vote as to whether Arizona shall be made a joint State with New Mexico. As a matter of fact in nearly all our Western States—I imagine it is so in Kansas, although I do not know—you can not add a portion of a county of a State to another county without the consent of the voters of the portion which is to be added to the county. I do not recall any instance where Congress has admitted a State and taken it into the Union against the protest of the people of the Territory out of which the State is to be formed. I hardly think you meet the question when you spread the people of New Mexico over the people of Arizona and let them decide for the people of the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. LONG. It is very difficult to obtain the consent of all the people of a State to a proposition that may be submitted to them. A portion of them may object and may show their objection at the polls. But the way in which the matter has been determined in the past has been for all the people within the proposed boundaries to have the opportunity of voting upon the proposition, and then a majority of those people to determine whether the constitution shall be ratified.

Take the instance of Oklahoma and Indian Territory. There is a proposition now pending in Congress for a separate State for Indian Territory. They made a constitution and voted on it at the polls, carried it, and submitted it here and asked for its ratification, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] introduced a bill to ratify that constitution. Yet, under the provisions of this bill, the people of Indian Territory and the people of Oklahoma are authorized to make a constitution, vote on it, and it is to be ratified and the State admitted if a majority of the people are in favor of the proposition, even though a majority of the people living in Indian Territory may vote against it.

I will ask the Senator if he believes that it is necessary and would he favor the insertion of an amendment requiring that the constitution for the proposed State of Oklahoma should have a majority in Indian Territory before it is ratified?

Mr. DUBOIS. I certainly would. But the evidence before us has convinced me that the people of the Indian Territory are satisfied to be joined with Oklahoma. If there were any doubt about that whatever I would be in favor of submitting the proposition to the people of Indian Territory, the same as I would to the people of Arizona; but I have been led to suppose that there was no opposition on the part of the people of Indian Territory. On the other hand, in New Mexico and Arizona, their accredited Delegate who has been sent here and who represents the voice and the sentiment of the people of Arizona is opposed to joint statehood, and his opinion ought to have great weight, as the voice of the Delegate always has had great weight in the action of Congress.

Mr. LONG. I believe the constitution for the proposed State of Oklahoma should be submitted to the people within the proposed boundaries, and the question as to whether it should be ratified or not should be determined by a majority vote at that election, and not by a majority in a part of the proposed new State.

But referring to Arizona, the claim is made in this memorial that there is something in the organic act creating Arizona which, while, as the Senator from Montana says, it does not amount to a legal or constitutional right, yet it amounts to a moral obligation on the part of Congress to make the boundaries of the proposed State of Arizona the same as the Territory of Arizona at the time this pledge was made. I read from the memorial presented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]:

That said government shall be maintained—

Quoting from the organic act—

That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall apply for and obtain admission as a State on an equal footing with the other States.

Then the memorial continues:

It is admitted that the Congress would have undoubted right to change the boundaries of Arizona as a Territory, but we insist that in all justice and fairness the provision of the organic act just quoted was a promise to our people when they applied for statehood to be permitted to come in as a separate and independent State on an equal footing with the other States.

In another part of the memorial, which is directed to the Senate, in giving the reasons why they should not be reunited with New Mexico, is this:

Second. The promise by Congress in the enabling act that the autonomy of Arizona should be preserved.

A year ago in the debate, notably by the then Senator from California, Mr. Bard, the argument was made that this was a pledge to the people of Arizona in 1863 that when admitted as a State they should have the same boundaries which the Territory of Arizona had.

To show how industriously this claim has been made, I wish to call attention to a letter I received this morning from a constituent of mine, a gentleman who, while he is well informed on subjects generally, probably had not given very much consideration to the details of this proposed legislation. Yet in this letter to me he sets out and quotes in full this provision of the organic act of Arizona, and says:

The United States is really under moral obligation to the people of Arizona not to force joint statehood upon them with New Mexico, because the organic act passed in 1863 provides—

Then follows this provision of the organic act, that they should maintain their own government until they were admitted as a State.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. What, in the opinion of the Senator, did that mean, if anything?

Mr. LONG. I do not wish to take the time this afternoon to give my construction of that language, but I refer the Senator to the speech the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] made a year ago, in which he in detail explained the purpose of those who had it inserted in the organic act.

Mr. SPOONER. I will reread that part of the speech of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator will find much in that speech of the Senator from Indiana to interest him, and I commend it to his consideration.

Whatever it may mean, the important thing was that the Territorial form of government should continue. As was shown very clearly by the historical references made by the Senator from Indiana a year ago, they were fearful that the Territorial government for Arizona might not continue very long. There were reasons why, when Congress came to consider the matter carefully, it might abolish the Territory of Arizona. There were few good reasons for its creation. So this provision was placed in the act, as was shown by the Senator from Indiana, to prevent Congress, if possible, from abolishing the Territory of Arizona.

Whatever it may mean, certainly it can not be held to fix the boundaries of the proposed State of Arizona and make them the same as the Territory of Arizona at the time the pledge was made, because it is an impossibility to do so. When that pledge was made Arizona had a different area from what it has to-day. It was made to the Arizona of 1863, and the Arizona of 1863 was an entirely different area from the Arizona of to-day. The Arizona of 1863 not only embraced the territory within these red lines [indicating on a map], the present Territory of Arizona, but also included that tract of 11,664 square miles [indicating]. If the pledge of boundaries for a future State was made in the act organizing the Territory of Arizona, the pledge was made to the people within that tract the same as to the people who may live within this part of the Territory [indicating], which is now the Territory of Arizona.

To show how impossible it is to carry out such a pledge, I call your attention to the fact that in 1866, three years after Arizona was organized, this part of Arizona was detached and annexed to the State of Nevada, and it is there to-day. Under the provision of the Constitution which prohibits any new State from being formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State without the consent of the legislature of the State, if we are to return to the area of 1863, as it existed at the time this pledge was made, we must take in that part of the Territory of Arizona which is now a part of Nevada; and that can only be done with the consent of the legislature of Nevada, for it is a part of that State to-day. This strip, or tract, is almost as large as the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut combined.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator, in completing his statement, if it is not true that the very large area which was afterwards detached from Arizona and added to the State of Nevada was not so done without referring it at all to either the people in the detached portion or to the people in the remainder of the Territory?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was done by an act of Congress.

Mr. LONG. It was done under the authority of Congress So whatever this provision may mean it certainly can not be contended to mean statehood for Arizona with the same boundaries as the Territory of Arizona at the time the Territory was organized.

If Arizona and New Mexico were States, of course they could not be combined into one State without the consent of the legislatures of the respective States. The constitutional provision is as follows:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, but no new States shall be formed, or erected, within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned, as well as the Congress.

Under this constitutional limitation Congress can not, without the consent of the legislature of Nevada, include that portion of the Territory of Arizona that was attached to Nevada in 1866 in the proposed new State of Arizona; and as the State of Arizona can only be admitted, under the construction given this provision, with the same area as the original Territory of Arizona the State of Arizona can not be admitted at all, unless the legislature of the State of Nevada consents that the strip that was taken from the Territory of Arizona in 1866 shall be included in the new State of Arizona.

This contention is certainly unsound and indefensible, and demonstrates that whatever may have been the intention of those who inserted this provision in the organic act of Arizona it can not be held to bind Congress to make the State of Arizona with the same boundaries as the original Territory of Arizona.

So it is for Congress to determine, untrammeled and unrestricted, whether the objection urged against the reuniting of Arizona and New Mexico, that were originally one Territory, and admitting them as one State is just and right under all the to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States.

circumstances, and Congress, in the determination of this question, is unhampered and unrestricted by legislation relating to the Territory of Arizona or New Mexico.

If I thought Arizona was entitled now, or would be fit in the future, for separate statehood, I would support one or all of the amendments proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. But considering the conditions there I do not believe that Arizona is fit for statehood now or that it will be fit for statehood in the future, and believing this I can not support either of these amendments.

There are some claims made in the memorial presented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] that I do not understand. The ninth reason given why the people of Arizona should not be joined with the people of New Mexico is as follows:

> Ninth. The objection by the people of Arizona, 95 per cent of whom are Americans, to the probability of the control of public affairs by people of a different race, many of whom do not speak the English language, and who outnumber the people of Arizona two to one, while the assessed valuation of Arizona exceeds that of New Mexico by over 33⅓ per cent.

The estimate of the Bureau of the Census gives the population of Arizona in 1905 as 140,276. According to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, 39,517 of these were Indians. According to the census for 1900, 14,223 people in Arizona were born in Mexico or Spain, and 24,233 were of foreign birth. The same census gives only 70,508 native-born citizens in Arizona.

In my opinion it is an injustice to the State I in part represent, with its million and a half of people; it is an injustice to the people of Oklahoma, if that State should be admitted under the provisions of this bill, to have admitted with Oklahoma or to be admitted hereafter a State with a population as meager as that which is in Arizona to-day.

Not only that, but there were in Arizona in 1900 only 44,081 males 21 years of age and over who could vote under the provisions of this bill, and of those 11,215, or over 25 per cent, were illiterate. There were only 30,306 native-born males 21 years of age and over. Of the 122,931 persons in Arizona in 1900, 28,911, or 23 per cent, were over 10 years of age, and could not speak English. This is the condition after forty years of existence as a Territory, and after more than half a century since the Territory came to us under the treaty with Mexico. What is the reason for this? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], in a speech that he made two years ago, speaking about the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as separate States, said:

> I believe that New Mexico is entitled, according to a fair interpretation of our treaty obligations, to admission without regard to any question, excepting only that of population, she having more than the equal of the unit of representation. I believe that in the exercise of our authority and sound discretion the Congress is justified in admitting Arizona, although at this present moment she does not have a population, perhaps, equal to the unit of representation.

I am in favor of carrying out the pledge made in the treaty with Mexico. But fortunately that pledge does not bind Congress to the admission of the people living within certain borders to a State with particular boundaries. The admission of the State of Arizona with the boundaries proposed in this bill carries out the pledge made in the treaty with Mexico. We carried out that pledge as to the Mexicans who lived in the State of California. We carried out the pledge as to the Mexicans who lived in Utah and other portions of the country that we acquired from Mexico. But we have never carried it out as to the people of Arizona and New Mexico. Why? These are the conditions as to population in Arizona. What reasons are there for such conditions? Senators who wish information upon that subject in detail should carefully read, if they did not hear, the very excellent speech of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK], who shows why there are but 140,276 people in Arizona to-day, less than 100,000 of whom are native-born American citizens. The area is sufficient for a State. The population is deficient. The resources are not sufficient. Why? Agriculture is, has been, and will be the chief industry of the citizens of that State. Agriculture is dependent upon the rainfall, the rainfall is deficient, and so agriculture is dependent upon irrigation. Anyone who will look into the estimates, the figures, the statements contained in the speech of the junior Senator from Ohio, taken as they are from official documents, can understand why there is such a sparse population in Arizona to-day.

Arizona is not a newly discovered country. It has not been settled recently. The first explorations in Arizona were made in 1540. There was another exploration made in 1580. The first settlement in Arizona was made shortly before the year 1600, before the settlement of the English at Jamestown, before the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Rock. So this is not a new civilization. It is old. People have been living there for centuries, and the reasons why they have such a sparse population, why their resources are so deficient, inheres in the nature of their physical conditions, inheres in the fact that there is not sufficient rainfall in order to carry on agriculture.

So it is that if in all this time their conditions have not been such that they will justify statehood, I do not believe that it is possible for a change to come in the future. And believing as I do that no change can come that will enable the people of Arizona to become fit for separate statehood, I am in favor of carrying out the pledge made in the treaty with Mexico, by admitting Arizona and New Mexico as one State. I am in favor of submitting the proposition to the people living within the boundaries of the proposed State and allowing a majority of those people to determine whether or not they want statehood.

As I have said before, I believe that the separation made in 1863 in the organization of a separate Territory for Arizona was most unfortunate in its effect on statehood for the people of that part of the United States. The pledge was made in 1848 that they should be incorporated into the Union, and yet we find that there has been no Congress since that time that has been willing to carry out the pledge. Fifteen States have been admitted since that time from territory, a part of which came to us from Mexico, but the pledge, so far as Arizona and New Mexico are concerned, remains to-day unfulfilled. I believe in making that pledge good. I believe in doing it in this bill.

Congress for over forty years has omitted to admit them separately, not because they each did not have sufficient territory, but on account of the sparseness of their population and their undeveloped resources. I do not believe now that they are entitled to separate statehood, or that either would make a State able to bear the burdens of statehood and do its full part in determining the future policy of this nation, but combined they will make a great State, in area larger than California—but you could add to it the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, and yet it would not equal Texas.

I am ready and willing to vote to authorize the people of both these Territories to unite and make a State, if they so desire. There may be objection on the part of a number of the people living in Arizona to this arrangement, and they may register their objections at the polls, but that should not deter Congress from doing its duty in the premises.

States have been admitted before over the protests of a strong minority, but the will of the majority was controlling, and the minority was obliged to yield a reluctant acquiescence. If this bill passes the Senate without substantial amendment, statehood is assured to the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory. Long-delayed justice will be accorded them, and a million and a half of people, occupying a rich and fertile country, will not longer be denied admission as a State because of the objection of a few thousand people on the plains of Arizona to the boundaries of that proposed State.

The prolonged struggle for the admission of Kansas is vividly remembered my many who now live in Oklahoma. They remember that four constitutions were made in Kansas, only to be rejected by Congress or the people. They remember that the Wyandotte constitution was only ratified by Congress after the election of Abraham Lincoln and a month before his inauguration. That prolonged struggle was over forty-five years ago, when they were young, active, and vigorous. Now, in their declining years, when age has cooled the ardor of youth, they have hopefully looked forward—three years ago, one year ago, and now—to the contest in this body on the question of statehood for Oklahoma. No one questions their right to be admitted. The vote here on statehood for Oklahoma and Indian Territory would be almost unanimous if it could be separated from the other part of the bill; but separation seems impossible. Let us end this struggle, and do it now, and admit the States of Oklahoma and Arizona. While our action may disappoint several thousand people in Arizona, it will be gratifying to the people of New Mexico, and will be hailed with delight and great joy by the million and a half people in Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

[a] Returns from State census not yet received.
[b] Census of 1900.

Mr. WARREN. Pursuant to the notice given, I shall be glad to take up again the Medical Corps bill, if the Senator in charge of this bill will agree to lay it aside temporarily.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it was the understanding that that should be done; and therefore I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. I understand it was the arrangement that on the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] the Senator from Wyoming was to go on with the bill he has in charge.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me to call up a bill for consideration by unanimous consent? I do not think it will lead to any debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WARREN. I do, of course, assuming that the bill will not lead to any debate.

Mr. NELSON. It will not.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4129) to regulate enlistments and punishments in the United States Revenue-Cutter Service.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT MILAN, ITALY.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WARREN. For what purpose does the Senator wish the floor?

Mr. WARNER. I desire to call up a bill in relation to the international exposition to be held at Milan, Italy, during the present year. I am frank to say that I understand there will be objection made to it; but, notwithstanding that, I feel it my duty to call it up. There will be no discussion whatever of the bill on my part.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, having the floor by the courtesy of the Senator in charge of the statehood bill, I do not feel that I can yield for anything which will cause a long delay; but I understand that this subject will soon be disposed of, and I therefore yield.

Mr. WARNER. There will be no discussion whatever on my part. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4412) to enable the Government to take official part in the international exposition to be held at Milan, Italy, during the year 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, being the statehood bill, be laid aside for the remainder of the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That bill has already been laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON. For the rest of the day?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For the rest of the day.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the letter of the Secretary of State shows the whole situation. In speaking of this exposition he says, "which, while a private enterprise, promises to be a large and important one." If this were an international exposition, undertaken by a foreign country, it would present an entirely different condition, but being, as the Secretary says, "a private enterprise," I do not think that the projectors and promoters, who are seeking to have this bill passed in order to get a place and pay out of the Government appropriation, ought to be gratified, and I must object to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WARNER. By unanimous consent I should like to have a letter of the Secretary of State and also a letter of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, together with certain other papers which I hold in my hand, printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. I, of course, have no objection to that.

The papers referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February, 12, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM WARNER,
Chairman Select Committee on Industrial Expositions,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of House Document No. 128, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, containing my request that an appropriation of $40,000, of which $12,000 is for an exhibit by the Bureau of Fish and Fisheries, be made to enable this Government to participate in the international exposition at Milan, Italy.

I also inclose a copy of Senate Report No. 402, showing the favorable recommendation by your committee that an amendment be proposed to the urgent deficiency bill providing for this object.

Inasmuch as the urgent deficiency bill as reported to the Senate does not contain an item for this purpose, I beg to express the hope, in view of the favorable action taken by your committee, that you will introduce an independent bill, a draft of which I inclose, and will urge its adoption by the Senate.

As the exposition is to open in April, action looking to our participation therein should be taken at once if at all, so that commissioners may be appointed and exhibits prepared. Already more than 200 applications have been made by Americans for space at the exposition.

That expositions of this character are of great value to American industrial enterprises can not be gainsaid. At the Liege exposition of last year more than 200 awards were made in favor of American exhibits, of which over 160 were to industrial enterprises.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ELIHU ROOT.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 15, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM WARNER,
Chairman Select Committee on Industrial Expositions,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the question of the participation of this and other Departments of the Government in the approaching international exposition at Milan, and to express the hope that, in view of the favorable action already taken by your committee, you will find it expedient to bring the matter to the notice of the Senate and secure early action thereon. This Department is desirous of taking part in the exposition, because of the special request of the Italian ambassador and because of the economic benefits to this country that will accrue therefrom. I have no hesitation in stating that the comparatively small amount involved would eventually be repaid many times in increased trade resulting from an increased knowledge of our products.

In the event of favorable consideration of this matter by Congress, appropriate action should be taken at once, owing to the early opening of the exposition.

Very respectfully, V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

[House Document No. 128, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 9, 1905.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Secretary of State of the 8th instant, and its inclosures, in regard to the participation by this Government in an exposition to be held at Milan, Italy, in 1906, to celebrate the opening of the Simplon tunnel, and submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $40,000 as an amount required to enable the United States to make a creditable display thereat.

Respectfully,

H. A. TAYLOR, Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

---

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 8, 1905.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith the translation of a note, dated October 22, 1903, from the Italian ambassador, together with copies of subsequent correspondence, concerning participation by the United States in an exposition to be held at Milan, under the high patronage of His Majesty the King of Italy, to celebrate the opening of the Simplon tunnel. The exposition was at first fixed for 1905, but was subsequently postponed until 1906.

By the Italian embassy's note of October 22, 1903, the hope is expressed by the Government of Italy that that of the United States will favorably consider the invitation and will encourage American citizens to exhibit at the exposition, which, "while a private enterprise, promises to be a large and important one."

The subsequent correspondence shows that France, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Great Britain, Belgium, Japan, Turkey, and several South American States had, up to October 21, 1905, given notice of their intention to participate."

One of the most important sections of the exposition will be that of "Fisheries in salt and fresh water—international." A special invitation was extended by the Italian ambassador's note of October 21, 1905, for the participation of the Bureau of Fisheries in this section. On November 8, 1905, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor informed me that his "Department will be pleased to accept the invitation of the Italian Government and make the desired exhibit if Congress grants the necessary authority and appropriation," and he added:

"As practically all the objects are already assembled, the expense of the project will not be great. It is thought that $12,000 will fully cover the cost of transportation, installation, maintenance, and return of the exhibit."

I have the honor to request that you will submit the papers to Congress to the end that that body may determine whether the invitation shall be accepted, in which case an appropriation of $40,000 (the amount granted by Great Britain for the purpose) will be required to enable the United States to make a creditable display at the exposition. This amount would include the $12,000 asked for in behalf of the Bureau of Fisheries.

It will be recalled that the Italian Government was liberally represented at both the Chicago and St. Louis expositions, its grant for the latter being $120,000.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ELIHU ROOT.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, November 8, 1905.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 6th instant regarding the participation of the Bureau of Fisheries in the exposition to be held at Milan in 1906. In reply I have the honor to say that the Department will be pleased to accept the invitation of the Italian Government and make the desired exhibit if Congress grants the necessary authority and appropriation. As practically all the objects are already assembled, the expense connected with the project will not be great. It is thought that $12,000 will fully cover the cost of transportation, installation, maintenance, and return of the exhibit.

Very respectfully, V. H. METCALF.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

ROYAL ITALIAN EMBASSY,
Washington, D. C., October 22, 1903.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: In order to celebrate the opening of the Simplon tunnel there will be held at Milan in 1905, under the high patronage of His Majesty the King, an international exposition, which is to include methods of transportation, insurance, and artistic works.

In accordance with the instructions which I have received from my Government, I have the honor to bring this to the notice of your excellency. The Government of the King hopes that that of the United States of America will give this communication favorable consideration and encourage American citizens to exhibit at the exposition, which, while a private enterprise, promises to be a large and important one, not only on account of the moral and financial backing which the people of the locality have given it, but also on account of the ability and standing of the persons composing the executive committee.

The nations are invited to exhibit in the following sections: Transportation on earth and in the air; marine transportation; insurance; decorative art; workshop of industrial art. It gives me pleasure to inclose your excellency a programme of the exposition, and to hold myself in readiness to send as many copies thereof as your excellency may desire, together with any other information or explanation which you think it advisable to ask.

Awaiting meanwhile the reply which your excellency may be pleased to make to this communcation, I avail myself, etc.

V. MACCHI DI CELLERE.

His excellency Mr. JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State.

ROYAL ITALIAN EMBASSY,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1904.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: In pursuance to instructions just received from my Government, I hasten to inform your excellency that the exposition intended to be held at Milan in 1905 for the purpose of celebrating the opening of the Simplon Pass, and to which I called your excellency's attention in my note of October 22 last, has been postponed until the spring of 1906. The executive committee of the above-mentioned exposition was obliged to postpone its opening owing to the fact that it is hardly likely that the new pass over the Alps will be opened up to the public before the summer of 1905.

My Government trusts that this postponement will in no way interfere with the participation of American industry and commerce in the various international exhibits promised for this occasion, and it even hopes that the delay will enable the American people to accept in still greater numbers the invitation extended to them by the city of Milan to cooperate, by their presence, in the success of an exposition which commemorates a new achievement of human ingenuity.

Please accept, Mr. Secretary of State, the assurance of my highest regards.

V. MACCHI DI CELLERE,
Chargé d'Affaires.

His excellency Mr. JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State.

ROYAL ITALIAN EMBASSY,
Washington, D. C., September 9, 1905.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: There has been sent to me, for submission to your excellency, the inclosed petition from the American committee for the Milan Exposition of 1906, to request, through the medium of your excellency, that the Federal Government will participate officially in the said exposition.

The fact that the Federal Government has taken part in the exposition at Liege, Belgium, gives rise to the hope that it will do as much at Milan.

As far as I am concerned, I can only recommend the petition which I transmit to your excellency's kind attention.

Accept, etc., MAYOR.

His excellency Mr. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State.

MILAN EXPOSITION, 1906, AMERICAN COMMITTEE,
New York, September 7, 1905.

SIR: This American committee on the Milan Exposition, 1906, has been honored in having assigned to it by the central committee at Milan, Italy, the very agreeable duty of soliciting, through the medium of your honored administrative department, the active participation of the United States Government in the forthcoming exposition, which, in commemoration of the completion of the Simplon tunnel, will take place in Milan in 1906.

It affords this American committee much pleasure to be thus called upon to invite the American nation to be represented officially at Milan upon the auspicious occasion referred to, and, as an item of information pertinent to the subject of the committee's communication, it would respectfully apprise you of the fact that the sum of £10,000 has but recently been appropriated by the British Government for the establishment and equipment of the British section at the exposition, thus following the example put by other foreign nations.

In conclusion, honorable sir, this American committee begs to tender to you the assurances of its highest esteem, and to pray that it may be favored with your response at your convenience.

Respectfully,

ANTONIO ZUCCA, President.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of State.

ROYAL EMBASSY OF ITALY,
Washington, D. C., October 21, 1905.

Mr. SECRETARY OF STATE:

The president of the executive committee of the exposition to be held at Milan in 1906, under the high patronage of the King of Italy, calls my special attention to the fact that one of the sections of that exhibition which bids fair to prove most important is the ninth: Fisheries in salt and fresh water—international. France, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, England, Belgium, Japan, Turkey, and several South American republics have already notified their intention to participate officially.

As it is well known that the United States is one of the most advanced countries in the fishing industry, the presidency of the Milan exposition holds that its accession to this section would give it special importance and be highly appreciated. While communicating the desire so expressed by your excellency, I venture to beg that you will use your good offices to the end that the Federal Government be pleased to authorize the Bureau of Fisheries, belonging to the Department of Commerce and Labor, to participate in the said special exhibition.

Thanking you in advance for whatever you may be pleased to do in the matter, Mr. Secretary of State, I offer to you the assurances of my highest consideration.

MAYOR.

[Senate Report No. 402, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Select Committee on Industrial Expositions, to whom was referred the amendment intended to be proposed to the urgent deficiency bill "To enable the Government to take official part in the international exposition to be held at Milan, Italy, during the year 1906," have examined the same and report it back with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill go to the Calendar under Rule IX, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PETER FAIRLEY.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to make a report at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. McLAURIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4860) for the relief of Peter Fairley, to report it with amendments. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the bill for which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] desires present consideration to be one that will provoke no discussion, and so I shall not object to it; but I must say that I shall have to take the floor at the conclusion of the consideration of that bill, and I shall object to it if it gives rise to debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN]?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4860) for the relief of Peter Fairley.

Mr. McLAURIN. The committee recommends the striking out of "five hundred," wherever it occurs in the bill, and inserting "four hundred and fifty."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "five hundred" and insert "four hundred and fifty;" and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "four hundred and fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay and return to Peter Fairley the sum of $450 paid by said Peter Fairley to the United States on a judgment against him on the bail bond of John C. Lott, who was afterwards captured and returned to the United States officers by said Peter Fairley. The said sum of $450 is hereby appropriated for said payment and return of said sum to said Peter Fairley.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator from Maine is ready to proceed.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. The pending bill is rather an important one, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Alger | Crane | Hansbrough | Rayner |
| Allee | Dick | Kean | Scott |
| Beveridge | Dillingham | Latimer | Simmons |
| Blackburn | Elkins | Long | Spooner |
| Bulkeley | Flint | McLaurin | Sutherland |
| Burkett | Foraker | Nelson | Teller |
| Burnham | Frazier | Overman | Warner |
| Burrows | Frye | Perkins | Warren |
| Carter | Fulton | Pettus | |
| Clapp | Gallinger | Piles | |
| Clark, Wyo. | Hale | Proctor | |

Mr. McLAURIN. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. MONEY] is absent because of sickness.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] has gone home on account of being ill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to summon the absent Senators.

Mr. HALE. I think a quorum will be here shortly.

Mr. FRYE. Let the list of absentees be called, and by that time there will probably be a quorum here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the list of absentees.

The Secretary called the list of absentees.

Mr. ALLISON, Mr. BACON, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. PENROSE entered the Chamber, and answered to their names.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. I do not desire to take the floor from the Senator from Maine, but merely rise to make a suggestion. The Senator from Maine has made a statement to the effect that this bill was the first of a series of bills having for their purpose a substantial increase in the various branches of the Army service. That was my understanding of the Senator's statement.

It occurs to me that this is an ill-advised method of proceeding to increase the Army. First comes the primary proposition, Does the Senate or the country stand for a present increase of the Army at all? If it should be determined in the affirmative, then the method of proceeding with the increase will become of very grave importance.

I think it is obvious that a question of this kind relating to unity in the service, a cohesive, inseparable branch of the public service, can not be intelligently disposed of in piecemeal. I recall the effort to reorganize the Army. That proposition led to a spirited and long-continued debate in this Chamber. The bill providing for the reorganization of the Army finally received a majority vote. That bill was not presented in segments. There was no pretense that we would legislate with reference to the artillery in one bill, the line in another bill, and the Medical Corps in still another; but, on the contrary, the entire subject was taken up.

It is a subject not readily divisible. It is true we might consider special cases involving the fortification of certain ports. It might be wise, perchance, to take up coast defense as a separate subject; but, as I understand from the proposition of the Senator from Maine, this is but the entering wedge, the beginning of a policy of disposing of one branch of the subject which belongs to and has intimate relations with other branches of the service.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CARTER. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator addresses his remarks to an observation made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] very much in the way he would do if the Senator from Maine were in charge of the bill and were laying out the premises. The Senator from Maine in his statement—which was merely his belief—that this bill is part of a plan to increase the Army, does not state what I believe to be the plan, and does not state what I believe to be the object of this bill. The object of this bill has nothing whatever to do with a general increase of the Army. It is merely to perfect the organization of the Medical Department of the Army as it now stands. The same course has been pursued with two or three or more of the other departments of the Army since the passage of the bill to which the Senator from Montana alluded, notably in the case of the Engineer Corps. It was found upon trial that that department had not sufficient officers to take charge of the great works in connection with rivers and harbors, etc. It has been found——

Mr. FULTON. May I interrupt the Senator from Wyoming?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask a question in the line of the Senator's suggestion. Is this bill really not a movement to correct a mistake, an error that was made in the former reorganization of the Army? That is, does it not seek to correct a mistake which was made in providing for the Medical Department rather than being an attempt to reorganize the Army?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Oregon, yes. It was a mistake in one sense, because the belief existed then, with some, at least, of the members of the Senate, that we needed a less force than experience has shown to be necessary.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Montana that this bill has no effect upon other branches of the Army. It is simply that we may have not an increase of numbers and not a very perceptible increase in expense—in fact, the expense will be at first decreased—but the object of the bill is to provide that the Army shall have its necessary percentage of surgeons, the same as it had before the Spanish war, before the general increase of the Army, and the same as the Navy has now and has always had, and not have the Army depend so largely upon contract surgeons.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. How many colonels are there now in the Medical Department?

Mr. WARREN. Eight.

Mr. SPOONER. This bill provides for sixteen?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. How many lieutenant-colonels are there now?

Mr. WARREN. There are twelve.

Mr. SPOONER. How many majors?

Mr. WARREN. I do not recollect, but I have the number here; yes, sixty.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, this bill provides for 110 majors and 300 captains, or first lieutenants. Are all these colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and first lieutenants to take the place of contract surgeons?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; numerically speaking.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what it means?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; the lieutenants at less pay, the majors, of course, at larger pay. But, as I remarked before—possibly the Senator from Montana did not catch it—we have had from 170 to 200 contract surgeons employed all during the last year. In fact it is necessary now and will be hereafter to employ that number, unless we enlarge the force. The proposed increase in the number of officers decreases an equal or larger number of contract surgeons, and thus the Army is not increased practically.

Mr. SPOONER. How much is saved by this bill?

Mr. WARREN. It saves the difference between the pay of the first lieutenants and the contract surgeons, with so many as serve as lieutenants——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. It does operate, then, to increase the Army?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. It does not increase the men employed. It simply changes from contract surgeons to captains, lieutenants, and so forth.

Mr. SPOONER. Contract surgeons are not a part of the Army.

Mr. WARREN. They cost money.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not talking about money.

Mr. WARREN. A good deal more——

Mr. SPOONER. I am talking about rank.

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that page 15 of the report shows, even on the most favorable showing, that there is an increase, not at once, but as the years go by.

Mr. CARTER. It is suggested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] that we are merely correcting a mistake made by Congress in the Army reorganization bill. Under the general title of correcting mistakes, we might very well consider whether Congress, according to the present judgment, did not make a mistake in fixing the maximum limit of the Army. If mistakes were made in the Army reorganization bill necessitating corrections which will result in an increase of the Army, I suggest that it is wise to have the whole of such increase—every part and parcel of the remedial legislation, if such remedial legislation be necessary—brought forward for the consideration of the Senate as an entirety.

I merely rose to call attention to my view of the observations of the Senator from Maine, for the purpose of suggesting the advisability of the recommittal of this bill, with a view to having the Committee on Military Affairs bring forward the entire proposition emanating from all the bureaus and subdivisions of the War Department, to the end that we may ascertain just what this increase will be, the branches of the service in which the increase will occur, and thus determine the necessity for the increase and determine whether the country, according to the consensus of opinion here represented, desires any increase at all.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there is great force in what the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has said. I think the Senate is entitled upon this fundamental question of the increase of the Army to the best judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs as to what the bill should be. I do not like this way of nibbling at legislation, getting in a partial bill about one part of an establishment and then another bill about another part of an establishment. I have never, in connection with the Navy Department, thought it was the wise thing to do. Six or eight years ago we had, as it was called, "a general personnel bill" for all branches of the Navy. We presented that bill. Older Senators will remember it—the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Kentucky, who is a member of the committee. We presented a general bill for the government of the different branches of the Navy Department and rules and regulations and laws about all of them, and that bill passed. From time to time there have been complaints—little work in certain cases; certain branches have had the advantage of others.

Now, instead of bringing in separate bills, I introduced a bill here covering all of the departments and branches of the Navy. The same has been done in the House. Later the committees will report, not a single bill for the Pay Department, for the Medical Department, or the Engineer Department, but a general bill; and I think there is great force in that course.

I was interested in the comments that were made and the arguments for this bill grounded upon the necessity of doing something for the Medical Corps by reference to the experience we have had in late wars. Mr. President, there never were any faults or defects of administration that were laid to the Medical Corps as it then existed or now exists. The trouble in the Cuban war was not with the doctors. It was not contended that they were inefficient or of insufficient force. That issue never was before the country, and is not now before the country.

Whatever complaint was made or whatever defects there were in the administration did not belong to the Medical Corps. We conducted that war, so far as this corps goes, in a way that attracted no criticism.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of my venerable, philosophic, and reflective friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] about the uses of a medical corps and about the figures and proportions of losses in time of war, and how, in Japan, preparation was made for the war and the medical corps was enlarged, in view of a great war, for that purpose. If the Military Committee came before the Senate to-day with the arguments of the Senator from Alabama, that the object of this bill is to prepare for a great war, I would see frankness and openness in it. I agree fully with what the Senator says, that it would have been folly inconceivable on the part of Japan, with what was imminent before that country, if she had not done what she did in organizing her medical corps. There are not many spectacles in history, Mr. President, more instructive than the condition, situation, and sentiment of the Japanese people in the years after the fruits of their war with China had been taken away and wrested from their hands and the silent and determined way in which Japan prepared for the mighty contest that was surely impending.

All that the Senator from Alabama has said about the wisdom of the Japanese in preparing for that war and in enlarging her medical corps and getting ready for the tremendous issues of war and battle are true, and if this bill were put on that ground, which, I think, is the only excuse for it, that we are legislating now to get ready for an incoming and impending war, it would be a different question. The Japanese would have been crazy, would have been lacking in patriotism, knowing that the nation was silently girding itself for the titanic conflict that came afterwards, if every department of her war establishment had not been put in training for immediate conflict—as it was.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I was deeply interested in the remarks of the Senator from Maine with respect to the Japanese. We, too, have had a war. We prepared for it; according to the Senator we prepared sufficiently. But we lost fourteen by disease to every one killed in battle, while the Japanese lost four.

Mr. HALE. We have not had much of a war.

Mr. WARREN. The comparison is four to one with the Japanese and fourteen to one with us.

Mr. HALE. I have said that nobody complains that the Medical Corps is deficient. In all the agitation that was made about the condition of our Army and about the insalubrity of the locations established for it and about its food, and everything of that kind, I never heard a complaint that the Medical Corps was inadequate or was responsible for the loss.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must surely have overlooked the current writings of the day.

Mr. HALE. I did not overlook them.

Mr. WARREN. There were no allegations against the men employed, but because of the shortage of men. I suppose the Senator will remember the achievements of officers of the Medical Corps, in the great discovery as regards yellow fever, typhoid fever, and so forth, and how they were stamped out of Cuba, also various diseases in Porto Rico, and thousands—yes, tens of thousands—of lives accordingly saved in Cuba and elsewhere. The Medical Corps has accomplished great achievements. It seems to me their past services are a guaranty that the force will be correctly and properly employed.

Mr. HALE. Nobody proposes to cut them down. The Medical Corps as it exists to-day is not subject to criticism. It has never failed. It has been adequate to every emergency that has come before it.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. The Senator will remember that my argument was interrupted, at least I was cut off by the regular order before I concluded.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PETTUS. I hope the Senator will not put me in the attitude of blaming the surgeons for what occurred in our Army. What I intended to impress on the Senate and what the Senator does not seem to have noticed was not that the Medical Corps had neglected its duty, but that it did not have the power to prepare. There were not that class of officers in our Army at that time. They had no power. The theory was that the officer of the line, the commander, was to do all this. They had separate men to do the commissary work and for the quartermaster's arrangements.

Now, the idea I wanted to convey was that there not only ought to be a sufficient number of these officers, and perhaps we have a sufficient number, but that the officers of the Medical Corps ought to have command of that corps and ought to have command of the medical preparations; that they ought to command in the field; I do not mean in fighting, but in the field they ought to have command of the hospitals and ought to have power to prepare them and power to prepare all the medical supplies and all the sanitary arrangements and regulations; and that they could not have unless they had sufficient rank. That was the idea I had; but I never dreamed of blaming the Medical Corps for improper rations or anything of that sort. It was not their business under our system. I want to have the system changed.

Mr. HALE. Those matters as to the control the Medical Department shall have are not in this bill at all. This is a simon-pure bill. We increase certain grades and ranks in the medical branch of the Army of the United States. It is not a question of rank. Of course the rank has been increased because all these officers desire that. The contract surgeons are to be gradually gotten rid of and their places taken by officers who are to belong to the regular permanent establishment who will have their retired pay.

But we have gone over all that. I agree fully that there is great force in the suggestion which has been made. This is a matter of increasing the Army, now an army of 60,000 men. That is the purpose. Nobody need have any doubt about that. The purpose is to increase the Army; and when we do that we ought to have what we have always had heretofore. We ought to have a proposition that deals with the increase of the Army in its different branches so that we may see what it is. The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will remember a controversy upon this floor years ago in which the increase of the Army was advocated very strongly in a time of profound peace by the then distinguished Senator from Illinois, General Logan. The contest was made on this floor, and it was the judgment of the Senate at that time that there was no necessity for the increase of the Army, and it was voted down.

Afterwards the question came up repeatedly, and, as in the bill I quoted from, the bill of 1901, it was a bill to increase the efficiency of the Army in all its branches. It was not a single bill; it was not what I have characterized as novel legislation, but covered the whole matter. Anyone who will look at the bill of 1901 will see that it covers the branches of the Army, as it ought to have done, so that we could look at it as a whole. That is what we ought to do now, and nobody ought to be against it or be doubtful about meeting that question as one question. Shall we now, in view of any possible emergency, increase the Army of the United States of 60,000 men that we have? If so, let us have a well considered and matured bill that covers all branches of the Army.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I think General Chaffee, in his indorsement of this measure, did not intend that it should have any such construction as the Senator from Maine has given it. General Chaffee says:

> But it does give early rank for majors and lieutenants, who are, in fact, the men generally employed for duty with troops, colonels and lieutenant-colonels being more generally administrative officers. For this purpose the number of colonels and lieutenant-colonels provided for in the bill seems to me ample for peace administration and for reasonable requirements in war for an army of 250,000 men.

What he plainly means by that is that for administrative purposes—for the medical staff, if you please—this increase would be sufficient for a large army. But to-day, of course, if the Army was increased, the troops would be provided otherwise. The increase of the Army to any extent would be by volunteer regiments that would come with their two or three medical officers.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, what is the force, in view of this contemplated increase, of the suggestion of General Chaffee about an army of 250,000 men? What is the force of that suggestion when he says this is sufficient?

Mr. PROCTOR. That there ought to be in the permanent Medical Corps men trained and of rank who, in an emergency, would provide the administrative force of an increase, but not for the care of troops.

Mr. HALE. That is all I have contended for, that the whole basis of this proposed legislation is on the theory of a greatly enlarged and expanding army.

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not so understand it at all. It merely provides for the present Army sufficient administrative force and sufficient force for duty with the troops, but it does not provide any force for duty with the troops in case the Army should be enlarged. If it was so enlarged, the regular force would be skeletonized, so to speak; it would be scattered through the increased volunteer force as brigade and division surgeons, and the surgeons with the troops would be regimental surgeons.

Now, in regard to contract surgeons, I consider them not so desirable by any means as the regular force. They have much less responsibility. They are not in the service for any considerable time. It is with them, to a large extent, but a makeshift, in order to get started in the profession, and they are constantly being weeded out on the best end. Anyone can see that these men are looking for some permanent settlement in the profession for life, and naturally the best ones would be those first to find such a place. They are constantly being diminished from the better end. The poor are left. I know one Secretary a few years ago was very glad to get rid of seventy or seventy-five contract surgeons. There is no question in my mind but that the Army is very much better off when they are permanent.

Mr. HALE. Suppose he had found them consolidated as a part of the regular establishment of the Army, and did not need them, he could not have gotten rid of them. There is the very point.

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HALE. That is the merit of the contract-surgeon system. If, in the case the Senator has cited, the Secretary had found that conditions were such that he did not need these officers, he could no more remove one of them than he could remove a mountain; they would become concentrated as a part of the establishment. That is the beauty of the contract system.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator is supposing a condition that did not exist. It so happened at that time that the regular authorized force was not in the field. Examinations had not been held extensively enough through the country, and, moreover, a large number of small posts on the frontier, twenty-five at least, that had been necessary during the Indian service, were abolished, and that saved in each case two medical officers.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. In connection with the observation made by the Senator from Maine I will state that the bill provides for examinations at each step and promotion, and if any surgeon is found to be incompetent at any point he is separated from the Army.

Mr. PROCTOR. In regard to a general measure to increase and reorganize all branches of the Army, I am not myself in favor of a general increase of the Army by any means, but I have recognized for a long time that this corps ought to be increased. The Senate a year ago passed a measure, substantially this one, I believe, giving the increase we did at that session, and we have at this session passed a bill increasing the Ordnance Corps somewhat. That was wise and proper, although I think the increase of this corps is more important. We should have in the Army the very best medical service that we can have. Much of our Army, unfortunately, must be in an unhealthy clime, and we ought to have the very best possible permanent corps and a permanent force nearly sufficient—I will not say ample; I would not go beyond the absolute requirements for present service; I do not believe this bill does that, but I would have one nearly sufficient to take care of the present needs, and to have any small lack filled up by contract surgeons, but not any large lack by any means.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says that a large part of the Army must be in insalubrious regions and conditions. What is the basis of the statement of the Senator that a majority or a large portion of the Army has got to be in doubtful and unhealthy climates?

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg pardon; I did not say a majority.

Mr. HALE. A large part.

Mr. PROCTOR. I said a large portion.

Mr. HALE. How large a portion?

Mr. PROCTOR. I think there are now about one-fifth—12,000.

Mr. HALE. At present only about one-fifth of the entire Army?

Mr. PROCTOR. But that force has to be renewed once in two or three years; it has to be changed.

Mr. HALE. There is just where the contract surgeon comes into advantage.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is the Senator's opinion about it. I am very decidedly of opinion that the moderate increase this bill asks for, not to overprovide, but nearly to provide for the permanent wants of the Army, ought to be made by an addition to the regular force.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply wish to call attention in a few words to what I think was on the part of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], reading from a book as he did, a somewhat exaggerated statement, I mean on the part of the author, as to the mortality of troops from disease as compared with the number who die from wounds in battle.

It is said that General Scott during the Mexican war lost one third of his force by disease. That was a very large proportion. General O'Reilly, the Surgeon-General of the Army, states in a letter which will be found in this report that during the civil war the mortality from disease was more than double that from casualities in battle. The Senator, reading from the book, stated that it was four to one, if I remember correctly.

Mr. PETTUS. I stated that in our wars the disproportion was less, but the figures the author gives here purport to be the official figures from the Government of Japan.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand. In the civil war, then, the casualties from disease were a little more than two to one as compared with the casualties from wounds.

Mr. PETTUS. In the neighborhood of three to one.

Mr. GALLINGER. General O'Reilly, the Surgeon-General of the Army, puts it at two to one, as the Senator will find in this report. That is all I know about it.

Now, Mr. President, in the Spanish war there was one month when the death rate was very high, but during the other months of that war the death rate was not very excessive notwithstanding our troops were in an insalubrious climate. In reference to the civil war, I want to read a paragraph from General O'Reilly's letter or memorandum touching that point. After speaking of the mortality in the Spanish war, he says:

> Nor would such occurrences be possible now in civilized warfare as for 600 wounded to lie for more than ten days on the battlefield, as happened after the second battle of Bull Run, on August 30, 1862, when many of the wounded died of starvation. That this was not one of the unavoidable horrors of war, but was, as stated by the Surgeon-General in reporting these facts, due to defective medical organization is evidenced by the fact that after the organization of the ambulance service of Letterman such occurrences ceased in the Army of the Potomac. After the great battles of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, and Chancellorsville, May 2, 1863, for instance, although the army was defeated, the field was cleared of wounded without confusion or delay.

I read this, Mr. President, simply to show that while our medical service was doubtless very defective at the beginning of the civil war (and the fact the Surgeon-General cites, that 600 of our wounded lay on the field of the second battle of Bull Run for ten days is an illustration), Letterman organized the ambulance service, and after that there was very little complaint along that line.

But since the civil war, almost forty-five years, very great advances have been made in this country, as well as in other countries, in the matter of sanitation and in the care of the sick. I have an impression that the results achieved by the Japanese, which were very satisfactory, would perhaps not be greatly in excess of what would be achieved by American surgeons of the present day. The advance in everything that relates to health and the treatment of wounds has been marvelous; and we are not behind the other nations in this matter of progress in medical science and surgical knowledge.

So I think we ought to infer, even in view of the results obtained by Japan, which organized the medical corps with the expectation that a great and prolonged war was to ensue, that if conditions were the same in this country very likely our medical organization might be equal to that of that progressive nation.

I do not question the Senator's figures so far as he cited them from the publication, but still I think the Surgeon-General of the Army perhaps is correct in giving the proportion as a little over two to one in the civil war.

Mr. President, I want to see an effective medical organization, and I am really at a loss to know whether this is a desirable bill or not. I have been very much startled of late in reading a debate in another body to see to what an extent we are increasing the retired force of the Army. I have sat here day after day without casting an adverse vote when officers, distinguished, deserving well of their country, have been promoted one after the other, after serving a single day, to give way for another distinguished officer to take his place. I have thought it was not a good policy, and yet, being a civilian, I have not felt like objecting to it. I think we ought to be careful in all our legislation not to increase the retired force of the Army or Navy to any greater extent than is absolutely necessary.

It may be that this bill is framed along safe and conservative lines, and yet I am impressed with the view expressed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] and concurred in by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. It seems to me we ought to legislate for the Army when trying to legislate for the Army by a general bill that will cover all the various corps of the Army, and understand exactly what we are doing when we give it consideration and vote upon it.

I want to see the Medical Corps as large as is needed. I want to see it as efficient as it can be made. I want to have our soldiers cared for in the best possible manner when they are sick or when they are wounded. It may be, as I said, that this bill is framed along safe lines; and yet I wish that it might have been a general bill covering the various corps, all of whom are clamoring for recognition.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] has reported a bill for the Dental Corps. I have thought it was a good bill. It is held up on a motion to reconsider, as I remember. If that bill and this bill could be consolidated, and all the other corps, whatever their demands are, could be included in a general bill, I confess I would see my way much clearer than I do to-day to cast an intelligent vote on the question submitted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to enter into any discussion as to what is the real true proportion of death between disease and wounds, nor have I any purpose to discuss a question that seems to me to be too plain to need debate, namely, the perfecting, as far as it may be possible to perfect it, of this corps—one of the essentially important branches of the military establishment of the country.

As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I only want to enter a warning here to the Senate not to be misled or sidetracked from the questions presented by the bill. First, it presents for your determination the question as to whether you want to continue or to abolish the system of contract surgeons in the Army.

There are very few—in all sincerity I say I doubt if there is one Senator on this floor for whose mature opinions I have greater respect or in whose judgment I repose more confidence than I do in those of the experienced and efficient and able Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. During a service of almost twenty years in the Senate I have been brought into exceptionally close contact with him by reason of protracted service upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which he is still the very exceptionally efficient head.

I differ with hesitation from a deliberately reached conclusion of the Senator from Maine, but I am forced to differ, and differ widely, from his conclusion when he tells us that he favors the contract-surgeon system in the Army because of its elasticity; that when the Secretary of War finds there is a superabundance of surgeons under the contract system it is easy to get rid of them by reduction, but under the system proposed by this bill it would not only be difficult, but impossible to reduce the number, because the Secretary of War himself is clothed with no authority to dismiss officers from this or any other branch of the service.

Now, I take issue with the Senator from Maine upon the very primal question as to whether the contract-surgeon system is best. I go further. I will meet him upon the more advanced proposition as to whether the contract-surgeon system is even a satisfactory system in the Army, and I take the negative side of that broader proposition. I say it is not, and my position is sustained by the unbroken chain of testimony from all the officials of the War Department. I apprehend that the Senator from Maine will find himself unable to fortify his position by any official or other utterance of any Secretary of War, Surgeon-General, or General in Chief of the American Army. In the very nature of the thing, the contract surgeon can not be the best.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a plain, direct question. I can understand that the officials of the War Department want more permanent officers. That is for Congress to settle. But in the last six or eight years that we have had this contract-service system in operation—and it was not put in unadvisedly, but after full discussion as an elastic corps being the best possible thing—where has come to the attention of the Senator any complaint about inadequate and faulty features in the contract service?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the Senator will give me a chance, I intend to answer that question.

Mr. HALE. I have failed to find such complaints.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will try to aid the Senator, and I will do it from the records of the War Department.

Now, this is what I was trying to say: The Senator is mistaken, if he will permit me to correct him, when he says that at the time of the adoption of the contract-surgeon system it was adopted as the best system because, perhaps, of its elasticity. I beg the Senator's pardon, that is not my reading of the record of the military establishment of this country. The contract-surgeon system was adopted for another and a very different reason, because it was the only way to get an adequate amount of medical service in the Army. The effort was made to enlarge the number of surgeons, to expand the Medical Department of the Army, and it was only after a refusal by Congress that the War Department was driven, against its own best judgment, to the adoption of the contract-surgeon system, because otherwise it could not get the doctors at all.

Mr. HALE. That is precisely what I say. The arguments for an increase of the regular establishment were the same they are now, and Congress refused to accept them and adopted the contract-surgeon system after full consideration, rejecting what is asked for now in this bill, rejecting a permanent increase, and putting on the contract system.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is precisely what it is my purpose to tell the Senator.

Mr. HALE. It was done precisely in that way.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am trying my best to tell the Senator so.

Mr. HALE. So it was after full discussion that Congress had rejected the idea of a permanent increase of the regular officers of the Army.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, I want to add—because the Senator falls short in his statement again—not only that, but since that time Congress has enlarged the Army. But these are matters I do not care to discuss. I did not rise for that purpose. I had but two purposes in my mind, and they are material, it seems to me.

I do not want the Senate to be led off by the suggestion that this is an insidious movement originating with the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, or perhaps further back, with the War Office, an entering wedge, as it were, for a permanent material increase in the size of the Army. I am perfectly fair, I think, when I say that technically speaking this is an increase, but literally and truthfully speaking it is not an increase of the Army at all. If it be an increase of the Army it is to this extent and no further: By issuing commissions it to that extent increases the Army in place of the civilian, the nondescript, the contract surgeon who is partly in the Army and partly out of the Army. It charges the Army to that extent with an increase of force. That is all the increase of the Army that is to be found in this bill.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has made it altogether unnecessary for me to repeat the advantages of the commissioned officer in the Medical Corps as compared with the contract surgeon. You go out in the highways and byways and with a dragnet gather in a lot of young, recently graduated doctors. You fix the value of his service, because you have already arbitrarily fixed it. He gets $1,800 a year, which is more than the lieutenant who bears his commission in the Medical Corps of the Army gets. I venture to say here, and I challenge contradiction upon the proposition, that there is not under our system of Government known an examination as severe, as difficult to pass as the examination to which the young surgeons are subjected before a commission is issued to them and they enter the Army as officers in its Medical Corps. I venture to say, and the record bears me out, that the percentage of those who pass that savage examination for admission into the Medical Corps of the Army is lighter than that of those who pass any other examination that is ever held in any branch of the service of this Government. So I stand unchanged in my conviction that for every reason, and especially for the reason so cogently stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], the commissioned surgeon is infinitely superior to and more desirable than the contract surgeon. As he told you, in the very nature of things the very best of the 270 contract surgeons which you have are the very first ones that you are going to lose, because the minute that any one of those 270 contract surgeons discovers a place where he can, in the private practice of his profession, make $2,000 a year instead of $1,800, which the Government pays him, he quits the service as a contract surgeon. As the Senator from Vermont told us, the best ones are the first ones to go and the residuum are the poorest.

But it is not that simply, Mr. President, that I wish to call the attention of the Senate to. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has suggested that this bill ought to be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. I hope the Senate will not adopt that suggestion. I think I can satisfy my friend from Montana that it would be useless to do it. In a somewhat extended experience as a member of the Federal Congress, reaching nearly to a third of a century, I venture to declare here and now that never since I entered the halls of national legislation have I had to do with a bill that had been as carefully prepared, as deliberately considered, as carefully and as often dissected and put together and subjected to the crucial examination of as many different critical experts as has the measure that now lies before this Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator will also remember that we had numerous hearings of the experts of the Medical Department, all of whom heartily approved of this bill and gave to the committee their reasons for their approval of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir. Now, Mr. President, what I wanted to impress upon the Senate—and that was the main purpose in my mind when I arose—was that it would be a waste of time to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Montana to recommit this bill, and I am proceeding now to tell him why. In the first place, this bill comes to the Senate with the unanimous indorsement of its Committee on Military Affairs. In the very nature of this legislation this bill must of necessity be largely technical. I think I am not guilty of any impropriety of speech when I say that the Senate might very naturally concede something to the Committee on Military Affairs superior to the general average of information upon the part of the Senate upon this purely technical question.

Now, I will trace this bill, if you please. It originated with the Surgeon-General of the Army. The Chief of Staff undertook to pass in judgment upon it. By the way; in passing I might say—what it is not necessary for me to state to this Senate—that my record shows that I have never been in sympathy with any piece of legislation that looked toward an enlargment of the Army. Upon the contrary, that record shows that I have consistently and persistently opposed everything in the shape of legislation enlarging the regular standing Army of this country. I may say, further, that I never did gain my own consent to approve of the plan for the establishment of a General Staff. I opposed it from its inception, and I am opposed to its continuance now. I thought it was an ill-advised movement at the time, concededly copied from, or if not copied from at least molded and modeled on, the German military plan. I have never yet been converted to the General Staff which was established so recently in our Army. As I have stated, it was modeled after the German system, and in the very nature of things, to my judgment, it was utterly unfortunate. It was taken from the military establishment of a monarchical government whose normal condition is one of preparedness for war.

Mr. HALE. And a military government.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And a military government. In the very nature of things it was not to be assumed that it would be adapted to a government like ours. It was top-heavy in its very construction. So I am not to be classed with those more liberal Senators who have ever at any time advocated or favored the enlargement of the military establishment of this Government. Technically, as I have stated, this is an enlargement of the Army; substantially and truthfully it is no enlargement of the Army.

But I was tracing the history of this bill. Prepared and submitted by the Surgeon-General of the Army—to whose efficiency and professional accomplishments I am sure it would be the pleasure of every Senator to testify who has an acquaintance with that officer—prepared by him, it was criticised and objected to by the General Staff. It was carried to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff did not agree upon its provisions. It was boiled down at last, concessions being made from all three of these original sources, and the Surgeon-General, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Staff all finally came to the adoption of the present pending measure. It was brought to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. By that committee hearing after hearing was given to the medical representatives, from the Surgeon-General of the Army down. So in this bill, whether it be a perfect piece of legislation or not——

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question. I have been told that there have substantially been no hearings on this bill in this Congress by the Military Committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, Mr. President, of course not.

Mr. HALE. But that the hearings were in another Congress.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; and the Senate passed this bill in another Congress.

Mr. HALE. Yes; because then the objections had not been appreciated or realized, but I have been told——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am sure it is the modesty of the Senator from Maine that has induced him to make that statement. The Senate in another Congress passed this bill after the hearings, not because the objections had not been discovered, but simply because the Senator from Maine at that time was not disposed to object, as he is doing now.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose that I knew then half as much as I do now with reference to the General Staff. The Senator from Kentucky could have defeated the General Staff if he had made the fight, and I fancy I could have helped him in that regard, but he did not and I did not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg the Senator's pardon. If I had had the remotest idea that any poor, feeble efforts of mine could have defeated the establishment of that feature of your Army, I certainly would not have been derelict or negligent.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator has convictions he does not commonly refrain from making them known because other people do not agree with him. He makes an independent fight. But I do not think the Senator realized, and I did not realize, the vast grasp and usurpation of power that was claimed by the General Staff. If I had realized it I should have made a contest on the floor of the Senate, as I ought to have done and as I am trying to do now in this matter. But we live and learn. We all know how measures get through, because they are reported by committees.

We can not consider everything; we must rely largely on committees; but now and then we find that the committees have made mistakes. I think the committee made a great mistake in ingrafting upon our system this German general staff. We did not need it. They perform great service to an army in the field, which conducts great wars and small wars; but I have never known any necessity for having this great military organization or military camp in the War Department. If I had known that and realized it, and if the Senator had, I think both of us would have joined in an effort to defeat it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, Mr. President; I can not agree with the Senator from Maine. I held those views then as firmly riveted as I hold them now. I did know it, and I remember very distinctly that in my discussion with the then Secretary of War it approached closer to an unpleasant discussion than any other matter that ever was debated between us.

Mr. HALE. None of us knew that in the Senate. The bill passed almost sub silentio.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But that I do not think is relevant to this situation.

Mr. HALE. I only suggested that to show that there had been no hearings of account.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The hearings were repeated and extensive; and based upon those hearings this bill passed the Senate.

Mr. HALE. In the last Congress?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; in the last Congress.

Mr. WARREN. It passed unanimously.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It passed without a single objection, and that, too, after this long delay, owing to the disagreement of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff and the Surgeon-General, protracted still further by these extended and repeated hearings before the technical committee of the Senate, which is the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say, with reference to the subject-matter and what the Senator was remarking upon and what has been said heretofore by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], that the then Secretary of War, Mr. Root, when this general bill was under discussion, insisted that we should keep the Medical Corps down to where we did keep it, so that there might be a fair trial, but after a fair trial he became convinced that he had been wrong, and, as the report now shows, his indorsement is as strong as even Mr. Root, who is always most excellent in diction and in argument, can make it.

Mr. HALE. The difference is that the Secretary changed his mind on information in a certain direction. Some of us are opposing this bill because we have got information about it that we did not have before. The Senator's citation simply shows that you can not hold the Senate to a proposition because a bill passes unanimously. Bills frequently pass unanimously. In regard to the isthmian canal we committed ourselves decidedly in favor of a certain project and then adopted another project.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that inasmuch as he has more to say upon this subject, with his consent I will get through with what I have to add.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What I wanted to add, Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I will not try to stop the Senator.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. HALE. I could not stop him if I desired to do so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On the contrary, I am always glad to yield to the Senator from Maine. I want to say to the Senate in all candor and frankness that it is useless to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Montana and send this bill back to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs exhausted every possible resource for information. The Surgeon-General of the Army stands behind this measure. The late Secretary of War and the present Secretary of War, whom I see before me, both stand behind this bill after the fullest measure of consideration. The General Staff itself stands sponsor for this bill. The President of the United States sent a special message to Congress showing his interest in and indorsement of this measure. The Military Affairs Committee of the Senate tells you here, through its chairman and the rest of us who constitute its membership, that we have given exhaustive, repeated, continuous hearings for more than a period of a year, and we have extracted every atom of information, we have gleaned every statement that is calculated to throw light upon any phase or feature of this proposed legislation. If you answer and say it is an imperfect bill, the only reply that the Committee on Military Affairs can make is that it is the best bill the combined effort of the General Staff, the Secretary of War, the Surgeon-General of the Army, and the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate is able to produce.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Kentucky be kind enough to give me some information on a few points? First, as I understand the law, in the Medical Corps as at present organized we have surgeons and assistant surgeons. This bill changes the grades into brigadier-generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We have now a brigadier-general of the Medical Corps.

Mr. NELSON. At the head of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. At the head of it. Then we have colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, and first lieutenants.

Mr. NELSON. What I want to know is by making this change in the title of the officers to what extent does it increase the salaries and to what extent does it increase the force?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The chairman of the committee has the tables on his desk. I have not them here.

Mr. WARREN. It does not change the expense one penny. The object of that part of the bill is merely to get shorter and better titles. Instead of having deputy surgeons-general it is proposed to have surgeons with the rank of colonel, surgeons with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, surgeons with the rank of major, and so forth; that is all. It does not change the expense or the rank.

Mr. President, the hour is late, and I assume that Senators are hardly prepared to vote on the bill. I therefore suggest that the bill go over, and I will ask to have it taken up early after the morning business to-morrow morning.

Mr. SCOTT. Some Senators have already given notice of speeches to be delivered after the conclusion of the routine business to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. Of course I will not interfere with prior notices and orders, but will ask that the bill may be taken up on the first opportunity.

Mr. HALE. I think that is fair. Certain Senators have amendments they wish to offer.

Mr. WARREN. Then I give notice that I shall seek to have the bill taken up at the first opportunity and complete its consideration.

Mr. HALE. I will join the Senator in asking to have the bill taken up at the first opportunity, because I do not want to delay it. I want it out of the way.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 7, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision 9 of section 3244 of the United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 69 of the act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved August 28, 1894, is hereby further amended so as to read as follows:

"Every person whose business it is to manufacture tobacco or snuff for himself, or who employs others to manufacture tobacco or snuff, whether such manufacture be by cutting, pressing, grinding, crushing, or rubbing of any raw or leaf tobacco, or otherwise preparing raw or leaf tobacco, or manufactured or partially manufactured tobacco or snuff, or the putting up for use or consumption of scraps, waste, clippings, stems, or deposits of tobacco resulting from any process of handling tobacco, or by the working or preparation of leaf tobacco, tobacco stems, scraps, clippings, or waste, by sifting, twisting, screening, or any other process, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of tobacco: Provided, That unstemmed tobacco in the natural leaf and not manufactured or altered in any manner shall not be subject to any internal-revenue tax or charge of any kind whatsoever, and it shall be lawful for any person to buy and sell such unstemmed tobacco in the leaf without payment of tax of any kind: Provided further, That any person who sells natural leaf tobacco to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars shall be deemed and considered a dealer in leaf tobacco and become subject to all the provisions, rules, and regulations of subsection 6 of section 3244, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 14, act of March 1, 1879, and also as amended by the act of March 3, 1883, and further, shall be subject to all the provisions of section 3360, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 14, act of March 1, 1879, and of sections 3359 and 3391, United States Revised Statutes: And provided further, That farmers and growers of tobacco may sell leaf tobacco of their own growth and raising to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars without being considered leaf dealers or manufacturers of tobacco and shall not be subject to the sections of the law and amendment thereof above named."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that was passed in the last Congress and has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means. The purpose of the bill is to remove certain restrictions now existing upon the growers of tobacco in relation to its sale. The bill was drawn by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and is approved of by the Treasury Department. Unless some gentleman on the other side of the House wishes to be heard, I will ask for a vote.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this morning the House, following the example of the last House, unanimously passed a bill repealing a nonrevenue-producing 6-cent tax imposed on leaf tobacco when sold to consumers or for consumption by any person, unless that person be the farmer and grower of the particular leaf actually sold. The farmer and grower, in other words, is not taxed, because he is the producer. The nonproducer is taxed who buys the leaf and sells it to consumers or for consumption. The law (Wilson tariff) REGARDS the leaf (when sold to consumers or for consumption by the nonproducer) as "manufactured" tobacco, and therefore taxable at 6 cents, although the tobacco is still in the leaf (simply cured), just as it was when the farmer sold it to this nonproducer.

While it is true the farmer and producer can sell his own growth and raising (or that of his tenants which he receives as rent) to consumers or for consumption or to dealers, manufacturers, and exporters—that is, to anyone, free of this tax—yet this farmer and grower's "hands and feet are tied," so to speak, by certain oppressive, unreasonable, and unnecessary rules and regulations of the Department, which force him to sell and deliver in person when selling to consumers or for consumption, which practically prevents him selling them.

In the main, these regulations and rules the manufacturers in 1894 requested to make the actual law, but Congress refused to do so, yet, notwithstanding this condemnation of these proposed rules, the Department, in 1894, promulgated some of these rules and regulations, and they have been and are now being enforced as and as having the effect of law. The repeal of this tax law will, in a large measure, if not entirely, free the tobacco growers of these oppressive rules, as shown by the report of the committee on this bill.

In addition to thus liberating the farmer, giving him the right to sell his tobacco as he does his corn, wheat, and rye, it will restore to commercial life the "retail dealer in leaf," and let him buy and sell leaf the same way. These "retailers" existed by the thousand under the McKinley Act, but they have been, by reason of this tax and these rules, commercially exterminated.

These retail dealers, under the McKinley Act, competed amongst themselves and with the tobacco trust and the manufacturers in the purchase of leaf tobacco from the farmer, and in this way the farmer's leaf was sold by him at a better price.

When these retailers were thus exterminated, straightway the tobacco combine proceeded to hold up the tobacco grower at his tobacco barn and fixed, and now fix, the price of his leaf tobacco, without practically any competition. Hence the tobacco growers throughout the country appeal to Congress to repeal this tax, that competition may be restored; that the retailers may be revived; that the old freedom of sale, without tax or restriction, may be restored to the grower and the middlemen, and that the tobacco trust may be unsheltered that lurks behind this tax wall.

The Dingley tariff act continued this tax. It was raised to 12 cents because of and during the Spanish war. Congress repealed the war portion of this tax—to wit, 6 cents—leaving unrepealed a tax, at the old figure—6 cents—which was imposed by the Wilson tariff act of 1894.

The McKinley tariff act repealed all tax on leaf tobacco in the hands of or sold by any person. It could be, and was, sold under the McKinley law, without the burdens and restrictions I have recited.

The sellers of leaf tobacco were simply required, under the McKinley law, to keep books, showing the sales, purchasers, their places of business, etc., and required to make reports to the revenue department when called on. This could be easily done, of course.

The bill, which passed last Congress and again this morning, was carefully drawn and guards against any and all frauds upon the Government. It was drawn at the request of the House committee by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Yerkes, and is based upon bills introduced in this and previous Congresses to repeal this tax and "otherwise" relieve the tobacco growers and sellers of leaf tobacco; but this bill simply repeals this 6 cents tax, carefully protecting the Government against all possible frauds. Much more so, I think, than under any previous law.

Last fall a constituent wrote me, asking about his right to sell tobacco under the present law. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD my reply and another letter. I not only explain this objectionable tax law, but cite and discuss these oppressive rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

LEAF-TOBACCO LAW EXPLAINED—FARMER TIED HAND AND FOOT.

NASHVILLE, TENN., October 18, 1905.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your recent inquiry, to wit:

"Do the revenue laws prohibit a farmer from selling his tobacco in the hand out in the counties where they do not raise any and have to buy all they use?"

I have the honor to answer as follows:

Without qualifying as a manufacturer, and without paying any tax, the farmer can sell his own growth and raising of tobacco, or that received from his tenant as rent, in the stalk, severed or unsevered, from the soil or in the leaf or hand, raw or simply cured, anywhere, in any amount, to anybody. This answers your question.

Or, differently stated, and in the words of the Department construing the law:

"Every person who sells raw leaf or leaf tobacco not of his own growth or raising to any person other than a qualified dealer in leaf, manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, or exporter, will be held liable as a manufacturer of tobacco, and leaf tobacco so sold by such person will be regarded as manufactured tobacco and subject to a tax."

In other words, "every person" who sells to consumers or by retail leaf tobacco not of his own growth and raising, or if he does not sell it to consumers or retailers, but sells it to some one else, not a dealer, manufacturer, or exporter, such person or such seller must, under the law, qualify as a manufacturer and pay 6 cents tax on his leaf so sold, it being "regarded" by the law as "manufactured tobacco," because not owned and sold by the farmer who owned and grew it, nor sold to dealers, manufacturers, or exporters.

The existing law as to the sale of leaf tobacco is found in section 69, Wilson tariff act, August 28, 1894. The McKinley tariff act, October 1, 1890, reduced the tax on "manufactured tobacco" from 8 to 6 cents. Section 69, above cited, made leaf tobacco liable to be taxed at 6 cents.

The Department, December 10, 1894, ruled that allowing the farmer to sell his own growth and raising of tobacco, without qualifying as a manufacturer, "is a personal right" (and at a later day ruled that it "is a personal privilege") which he can not delegate to others.

The right to not be a manufacturer is the right of every American citizen, because he is an American citizen.

Nevertheless, as a result of this harsh construction of the law, the Department has further ruled:

(1) The farmer can peddle his leaf, but he must do so "himself." (Internal Revenue Decision, Nov. 16, 1897.)

(2) "A farmer can not employ an agent to travel from place to place and sell and deliver his tobacco, but that he may himself sell and deliver the tobacco in any quantity; that if the tobacco is sold on sample by an agent, it must be delivered by the farmer or grower himself directly to the consumer." (Internal Revenue Decision, Jan. 3, 1899.)

(3) "In this connection it is well to state that the privilege granted the farmer or grower of selling his tobacco to any person and in any quantity is a personal privilege, which can not be delegated by him to another person, and he would not have the right to ship his tobacco to another person to be sold by such person directly to consumer, but he may place it in the hands of a qualified dealer in leaf tobacco to be sold to other qualified dealers or to manufacturers, or to persons who purchase tobacco in packages for export." (Internal Revenue Decision, Jan. 3, 1899.)

(4) "If the tobacco is placed in the hands of an authorized person who would sell or attempt to sell and deliver the same to consumers, it would be liable to seizure and forfeiture, and the person so selling the same would be subject to prosecution for engaging in and carrying on business without qualifying as a manufacturer and properly packing his tobacco and labeling, marking, branding, and stamping the packages." (Internal Revenue Decision, Jan. 3, 1899.)

Thus you see that, while the farmer can sell his own growth and raising of leaf tobacco, or that of his tenant's, to any and every one, he can not employ an agent to sell to anyone and everyone. The farmer is thus denied the full benefit of the law of agency in selling his leaf tobacco, but as to all other agricultural products he is fully protected by the law.

It is no answer to this condition of the tobacco farmer to say that "he can employ a dealer in leaf to sell for him," because that dealer can only sell to three classes—dealers, manufacturers, and exporters—while the farmer can sell to any and everybody.

Paragraph 2, section 69, Wilson tariff act, imposed these burdens on the farmer and this tax on leaf tobacco when sold by purchasers to consumers or by retail. This act repealed the McKinley tariff, which untaxed leaf and persons selling it and only required those who sold it to keep books showing their sales, names of purchasers, and their places of business to trace the leaf sold if necessary.

The McKinley tariff allowed the farmers to sell their own growth and raising of tobacco in the leaf by simply keeping these books. Retail dealers in leaf bought and sold leaf and simply kept these books. Dealers in leaf and manufacturers could and did qualify as retail dealers in leaf and bought and sold it the same way, and at the same time continued their respective businesses as dealers in leaf and manufacturers.

But under the present law the retailer (farmer excepted, as stated), the dealer, and the manufacturer who sell leaf tobacco by retail or to consumers must qualify as manufacturers and pay the tax of 6 cents on the leaf thus sold, which is regarded when so sold as manufactured tobacco, although it is the identical leaf they bought of the farmer and in the same condition—raw, in the leaf, or in the hand—as when the farmer sold it to them untaxed and unmanufactured and without the farmer qualifying as a manufacturer.

Any change to the natural leaf, whether by hand, machine, or otherwise, except to cure it in the ordinary way, makes the leaf manufactured tobacco, and taxable (par. 1, sec. 69, Wilson tariff act), and the person changing it, for sale or gift, becomes a manufacturer.

The present law, imposing this tax on leaf tobacco, and burdening nonproducers who sell it to consumers or retailers, has crushed out of commercial existence the retail dealers who operated under the McKinley Act, and prevents others from now embarking in that business. The retailer was one of the farmers' best customers.

If this law is repealed the farmer's hands and feet will be untied. The abominable rules above named, if ever necessary, would be unnecessary and abrogated. The retailers will revive, compete amongst themselves, with the tobacco trust and all others, for the farmer's leaf, thus giving him a better price for his tobacco and an open chance to all parties to buy and sell it in the leaf.

I introduced a bill in the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congresses to repeal this tax and to give the farmer, with his own product, the right to sell it through any duly authorized person, or to hand stem or hand twist and hand press, etc., the same and sell it free of tax.

Unanimously the House of the last Congress passed the bill untaxing leaf in any person's hands, which would have also abrogated the rules of the Department which deny the farmer the full benefit of the law of agency.

The Congress adjourned before the Senate had concluded its investigation of that bill.

We hope this Congress will repeal, at least, this tax law. Its repeal will operate, in a great measure, as an entering wedge for more relief in the near future, I trust. The farmer should have more relief, but as this tax produces no revenue, we may succeed, if we all unite in securing the repeal of the law imposing it.

This will allow any person to sell leaf tobacco as we now sell wheat, corn, and rye.

This subject is so very important that I thought it proper to thus write you fully.

I thank you very much for your kindly expression of approval in the matter of my assistance, gladly rendered, for the relief by Congress of the old Confederate soldiers. I rejoice to know that feeling toward Confederate soldiers is far more kindly, not only in Congress, but throughout our glorious Republic than heretofore.

Yours, very respectfully,

JOHN W. GAINES.

M'KINLEY TARIFF ACT AS TO TOBACCO OFFICIALLY EXPLAINED—INTERNAL-REVENUE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT OF OCTOBER 1, 1890.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., October 28, 1890.

S. D. WARMCASTLE, Esq.,
Collector Twenty-third District, Pittsburg, Pa.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 21st instant relative to the internal-revenue provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes."

As to section 27, removing restrictions upon farmers and growers of tobacco, you are informed that the special taxes imposed by the laws now in force upon dealers in leaf tobacco, etc., are not repealed until the 1st day of May next, but the provisions of the statutes imposing restrictions upon farmers and growers of tobacco, in regard to the sales of their leaf tobacco and the keeping of books, or imposing a tax on account of such sales, were repealed at once on the passage of the act. Farmers can therefore sell their crop of leaf tobacco to anyone and peddle it about the country without restriction any further than keeping a correct account, so as to enable them to make a true and correct statement, under oath, on demand of the revenue officer, of all the sales of leaf tobacco, the number of hogsheads, cases, or pounds, with the name and residence of the person to whom it is sold and the place to which it is shipped.

Every farmer or planter who willfully refuses to furnish such information or who knowingly makes false statements as to any of the facts aforesaid is liable to a penalty not exceeding $500.

Persons who buy leaf tobacco from farmers and sell again are liable to the same special taxes, either as dealers in leaf tobacco or retail dealers in leaf tobacco, as now prevail until the 1st of May next. They will then be relieved from the payment of the special tax, but not from the requirement in regard to keeping books showing from whom the leaf tobacco was purchased and received, to whom sold, etc., as the law and regulations now prescribe. They will also be required to register. (Sec. 26.)

The provisions of sections 28 and 29 relative to peddlers of tobacco take effect immediately. Most of the provisions relative to peddlers heretofore in force are still retained, with such modifications as are rendered necessary by the repeal of the special taxes. As those taxes are not repealed until May 1, it would have been more consistent to have had these provisions take effect at that time, but as the law does not so state, it went into effect at once on the passage of the act.

The provisions of sections 32, 33, 34, and 35 also take effect at once. The bond of a cigar manufacturer, under section 3387 as amended, will be in such penal sum as the collector may require, not less than $100. The provision heretofore in force relative to an additional hundred dollars for each person employed in making cigars was stricken out.

No special stamp has yet been provided for sample boxes containing not less than twelve or more than thirteen cigars. Until one has been provided, such boxes should be stamped the same as a box which contains twenty-five cigars.

In all probability the new stamp for twelve or thirteen cigars will not be ready before January 1, 1891.

Respectfully, yours, JOHN W. MASON, Commissioner.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15331—the Indian appropriation bill—with Mr. CURRIER in the chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill presented carrying appropriations for the support of the Indian Department for the next fiscal year presents no new question of policy in reference to the treatment of our wards. The bill is new in form, but in form only. The Indian appropriation bill has been the growth of years, as various arms of the service have developed, and it has been presented in a rather conglomerate form. The committee thought, therefore, it was wise to redraft the bill and they now present it in a form which we believe, as soon as the Members of the House who are interested in the subject become familiar with it, will meet their approval. They will find it easier to follow the appropriations and to determine just precisely what Congress is doing for the various Indians. For instance, the old bill, in its first section, appropriated first for Indian agents, then had a miscellaneous division; then for treaties, then a miscellaneous division; then for incidentals, then a miscellaneous division; then for schools, and then another miscellaneous division; so that if a gentleman desired to ascertain, for instance, what we were doing for the Crows, or the Sioux or the Apaches or some other Indian tribe it would be necessary for him to look first, say, on page 13, and then on page 44, and then on page 67, and, unless he were somewhat familiar with Indian legislation, it would be difficult for him to see just what we were doing. The bill now as presented provides first for all matters that come distinctly under the supervision of the administration of the President, then for those under the Secretary, then for those under the Commissioner, then for the few matters which are general, as, for instance, the board of citizens serving without compensation, which is under no particular authority save the appointment of the President. Then it takes up the balance of the subject by States, agencies, schools, gratuities, and treaties, so that when we come to Arizona or South Dakota we can find grouped together what is appropriated by way of gratuity or by way of fulfilling obligations to each particular tribe of Indians, and any Member of the House can at once, by referring to the section of the bill, ascertain what we are doing in any particular locality or for any special tribe or tribes of Indians.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that this subject is dry, that it does not present to the average Member of the House the interest that the naval bill, for instance, does, or the Army bill, or even the post-office bill; certainly not the interest that has been shown here time and again in a river and harbor bill, which puts a salve upon the majority of the Members of this House, nor the legislative bill, which cares for, we believe in generous manner, the tens of thousands of employees of the Government here in the city. Yet, Mr. Chairman, dry though the subject be, and hesitating, as I do, to detain a committee in a discussion of this dry subject, I shall occupy sufficient time so that I may be able to show, if possible, that a large amount of gratuities that we have donated for the support of these people through all these years and the large amount of their own funds which we have dispersed as their natural guardians or trustees——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly, at any time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under your new form of bill is it possible to make any comparison with the appropriations heretofore made for the several objects you have appropriated for in this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes. Comparison can be made; comparison equally accurate, but less easily. It would take—has taken—me very considerable to make the comparison, and I do not wonder that the gentleman from Minnesota, with the burdens resting upon his shoulders, with the vast amount of work imposed upon him as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has not been able to make it. I have compared the present bill, as presented, with the bills heretofore presented to the House and can at any time refer any gentleman desiring the information to the page and the line of prior laws which are identical, wherever they are identical. I suppose that is the information the gentleman desires.

I want to take sufficient time, Mr. Chairman, to say to the House that all this money that has been expended for the red men, whether as a gratuity or as disbursed from their own funds by us as trustees, has accomplished much in leading toward the goal we all desire to reach for the red men, to wit, to make them self-supporting citizens of this country of ours. As I said before, we present no new policy and we do not enlarge particularly in this bill upon any old policy. We do provide, and provide liberally, for the continuance of education, not merely in the schoolroom, not merely in the reservation day schools, and in the larger nonreservation boarding and industrial schools, but we provide for the broader education, the education which takes place at home, in the kitchen, on the farm; the education of the individual by the matron and by the practical farmer. We provide for all of that, Mr. Chairman, by this bill, and we provide for the continuance of the policy of enforced labor, which, in my judgment, has done even more perhaps in the past decade than the education in the schools which we provide for the Indians to lift them to a higher plane of citizenship. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have every year reports from various agencies, superintendents, matrons, farmers all over the United States, speaking specifically of the conditions at the agency or school or locality where the officer making the report is in charge, and I intend to read briefly from this latest report covering various sections of the country. I will take, if you please, first the report of the Indian agent at Fort Apache, Ariz., and he says:

> There is not an Indian girl or woman on the reservation who has attended a nonreservation school and there never will be if the parents' consent must be had. They have the notion that girls need no education or training.

That is a condition which we do not find generally. That is a special condition in that regard down there. The only condition that we find mentioned in all the reports from all sections of the country, the one wail that goes up from all the agents and from all those who are in charge of the Indians, the one outcry is that liquor does more to damage the Indians than any other single element, and where it is possible to exclude liquor from coming into the reservation or prevent the Indians from having it, there is a greater degree of development and a less amount of crime.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. While the gentleman is on that point will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman if there is not an appropriation in this bill of $10,000 for the purpose of preventing the sale of intoxicating drinks upon Indian reservations?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true. There is the usual provision for the duties of Indian police, but a very much enlarged provision, providing Indian police whose duties are very largely to prevent the introduction of liquor onto reservations; and then there is, besides, a special provision appropriating $10,000 for special service, permitting the Secretary or Commissioner, in such manner as he thinks best, to provide for special detective work, if you please, in apprehending white men who insist on infringing the law, and giving liquor to the red men.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What I desired to ask the gentleman was, in what way is it proposed to use this $10,000? Is it under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. SHERMAN. The appropriation was made in response to the recommendation of the Commissioner, contained on page 27 of the annual report for this year, in which he reviews a recent decision of the Supreme Court in reference to a Kansas case, where liquor was given to Indians, and where the contention was that the Indian having become a citizen under the ordinary citizenship law, therefore the liquor law did not apply. And the Commissioner asked for this special appropriation so that he might, away from the reservation, away from the point where the Indian police are patrolling and guarding, make such provision as he could to prevent the giving or the selling of liquor to the Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I notice also that in the bill of last year we appropriated $100,000 for Indian police purposes. This year we have doubled that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The bill carries $200,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is that increase found necessary in order to prevent the sale of whisky on various Indian reservations and in the Indian Territory?

Mr. SHERMAN. That increase was made for this reason—I am not sure that the gentleman was present at the hearing——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think I was.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer the gentleman's other question first. The $10,000 is to be distributed by the Commissioner, subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. At the hearings the Commissioner stated in substance that he was unable at the present prices to get the best Indians to act as police officers. They have heretofore been paid $15 per month for captains and $10 per month for privates, and he said that the best Indians could not be retained in the service at that price; and it is his desire to increase the compensation to $25 per month for the captains and to $20 per month for the privates; and that is the reason the increase is asked for that service.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is an increase of pay, then?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is an increase of pay, and in order to better the service, as he believes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman this question—if it is not a fact that in the Indian Territory a great deal of intoxicating drink is brought in there by the express companies, and that the law of the United States now prevents the sale or introduction of whisky in that country, yet it is still brought in there by express companies? Should there not be some amendment to the law—I presume it might be subject to a point of order on this bill—that would prevent the introduction of whisky into the Indian Territory or into any Indian reservation by means of the express companies? They do that on the ground that it is State freight, on the same ground that they ship into all local-option communities in the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman understands the conditions in the Indian Territory quite as well as I do. He lives near there, and this provision here does not relate especially to the Indian Territory. It relates to every reservation and to every Indian anywhere in the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But the gentleman is aware of the fact that the express companies do carry intoxicating drinks into the Indian Territory?

Mr. SHERMAN. Never having been in the Indian Territory, I can not say that I have seen the express companies do so, but I have no doubt that the express companies and the railroad companies and the stages carry it and a great many individuals dispense it to the Indians in violation of the law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think, it being interstate trade, we can regulate it, and that we should regulate it?

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is so—if it is interstate commerce—we would refer it to another committee than the Committee on Indian Affairs to dispose of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not the duty of the Committee on Indian Affairs to protect the Indians, and would not that be the most effective way to protect them?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the duty of the Committee on Indian Affairs to protect the Indians. The gentleman is a member of that committee and is responsible, in a measure, for what we do, and for what we leave undone if anything is left out.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the rules of the House would not permit an amendment to be offered, as a point of order could be made and it could not be put upon this bill. It could be offered, and let some man raise the point of order against it if he desires to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman would answer a question that I will ask him, it may be an entire answer on the subject. Has the gentleman introduced a bill and sent it to the committee of which he is a member on that subject?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have an amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, but the gentleman knows the rules. If the gentleman wishes to accomplish a reform, why not proceed in the regular way with it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Like all other reforms, you can not reach it, being hampered by the rules of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will proceed along the line I was discussing when interrupted.

The superintendent at Fort Mohave school, Arizona, said:

Adults as well as minors have made rapid intellectual advancement. The former have taken their places in the industrial ranks on the railroads, in the car shops, and in the mines, with credit and profit to themselves and the Department.

The agent at Moqui training school, in Arizona, says:

Better and cleaner homes are in evidence, better and more civilized clothing is worn, larger houses with good doors and glass windows are being builded by the Indians with their own money and labor.

The agent at Fort Defiance, Ariz., says:

Wherever labor is wanted the Navaho is employed. They secure employment in the beet fields, at various mines, and on the railroads, and generally are given the preference over other Indians and Mexicans. At the present time a number of Navaho are working on the improvements now being installed at the Zuni Reservation. I have encouraged the Indians to leave the reservation to find employment, and they are willing to go almost any place to secure work. The railroad company has paid Indians 10 cents per day more than they pay Mexicans.

The farmer in charge of the Navaho extension reports:

There has been marked progress, both moral and otherwise, the past year among the Indians on this reservation. Active interest is being taken by many of them for the improvement of their farms and stock, and especially the blanket industry, which they depend on largely for their support.

The superintendent at Pima Agency says:

There is a noticeable improvement in their dress, manner of living, and desire for articles of furniture. Packing boxes are collected and utilized, homemade chairs, tables, beds, etc., are seen everywhere. The parents recognize the value of an education, and all healthy children of school age are in school. These people nearly all belong to church. When the bell rings on Sunday afternoon, no matter how warm the weather, large numbers of clean, orderly men, women, and children troop by, and can be heard singing hymns during the afternoon hours.

The farmer in charge of Papago, Tucson, Ariz., says:

They are self-supporting, and without a single exception they dress in the manner of civilized persons. The male Indian wears short hair, he buys and wears ready-made clothing, and the women purchase the necessary material and make dresses for themselves and for their children.

The agent at San Carlos, Ariz., says:

The Apaches, thrown upon their own resources, are responding eagerly to demands for laborers. Funds at the disposal of the agent have been totally inadequate, but near the end of the last quarter the demand for labor at the Government dam site on Salt River and on railroads nearing the reservation has been such that every Indian desiring it has been supplied with work at good wages. Indians who were obliged to attend to their crops were impatient for the time when they could be released to take advantage of the wages offered, so that now the reservation is pretty well depleted of able-bodied men and boys. Being nomadic by choice and tradition, or circumstances, they take their families with them. From this time on any large work undertaken by the Government may count upon Indian labor as a factor to supply the demand.

The superintendent in charge of Hoopa Valley Agency, Cal., says:

All the Hoopa Indians wear white man's clothing. Nearly all speak English and many can read and write. Nearly all of them occupy frame dwelling houses, and own good gardens, fields, and stock. They are advancing slowly but surely in civilization, industry, morality, temperance, and independence, and are physically, mentally, and morally superior to the average western Indian. In time they will make good citizens, which is the object we seek to attain.

Most of the Indians seem to be prosperous, contented, and happy. Crops were good, prices remunerative, and work plentiful at good wages. Some of the old folks depend largely on acorns, salmon, nuts, fruit, and berries for subsistence, but the majority earn a comfortable living by freighting, wood cutting, lumbering, sheep shearing, packing, farming, and gardening.

The school superintendent of Round Valley Agency, Cal., reports:

Some of them do considerable freighting for the Government, as well as for the white people in the vicinity. Still others work on ranches in the surrounding country, and a few go to the coast and work in the sawmills for a portion of the year.

The superintendent of the Lemhi Agency, Idaho, reports:

There has been a very great improvement in the habits of these Indians in the last year. Drink has been indulged in to a less degree than formerly, and their moral condition has improved. Satisfactory progress has been made in the way of improving their farms and in an agricultural way. A larger area of land has been cultivated and brought under irrigation; 708 rods of fence have been erected and 2,039 rods repaired. The number of Indians occupying houses has been increased from 75 to 89, and six Indians who never farmed before have been added to the list of farmers. More work has been performed by Indians, in return for rations, in building and repairing roads and ditches, than in any previous year.

The school superintendent in charge of Potawatomi Agency, Hoyt, Kans., reports:

The most noticeable change in the Indians is their attitude toward the school, and all the change is in its favor. I have not experienced any trouble in keeping up the attendance, which has averaged perhaps the largest of any year in its history, and all accomplished without friction.

The civilization of the Potawatomi tribe has made marked advance in the past few years. Nearly all dress in citizen clothes; a few still wear the costume in part, but the marks of the savage are rapidly disappearing. A large majority of the tribe speak and understand the English language and are competent to transact their own business without the aid of an interpreter.

The agent at the Blackfeet Agency reports:

Previous to 1901 there were on the ration roll of this reservation the entire population, about 2,100. We start the fiscal year of 1905 with something less than 100. I do not believe that any actual suffering has resulted from the inauguration of this policy, and these people are fast learning the lesson that you "can't get something for nothing." The result has been that each year has seen an increasing number of families cultivating little patches of root crops to take the place of the rations formerly issued.

The superintendent in charge of the Nevada Agency reports:

During the year just passed there have been no material changes in the affairs of the Indians of this reservation. They still continue to show a steady advancement toward civilization, and are industrious, and, I believe, appreciate what is being done to educate their children.

The Indians on this reservation are wholly of one tribe. Besides working their own ranches, they are employed all over the surrounding country, and during the past summer they have invariably received the same wages as the whites.

The school superintendent in charge of western Shoshone Agency reports:

These Indians have made an effort to improve their homes and are building substantial log houses, inclosing more hay lands, and building dams and ditches to water their meadows better. As a result their hay crop is increasing from year to year, and as there is a regular demand for all surplus at from $8 to $10 per ton in the stack, they are beginning to get on a permanent self-supporting basis. About $4,000 worth of hay and $3,000 worth of horses have been sold this year.

The school superintendent in charge of Navaho Training School, in his report, says:

The Indians in the locality mentioned above are, by their own efforts, making rapid strides toward progress. Those living along the river are taking out ditches and utilizing the land available for farming purposes. They have, by their own efforts, taken out some twelve irrigating ditches, and the results of this year's crops have greatly encouraged them, being more than double the amount raised in any one year heretofore.

A number of substantial stone houses have been erected on different parts of the reservation by the Indians, and a great many more would be built if the Indians could secure lumber for doors, window frames, and flooring.

Stock raising, blanket weaving, and silversmithing are the principal industries of the Navaho Indians. It is a poor family that does not possess from 100 to 1,000 head of sheep and goats.

The superintendent in charge of the Cheyenne and Arapaho (Okla.) Training School reports:

Industry.—There has been a marked improvement in this line in the past year. A large increase is shown over former years in the number of able-bodied Indians who realize that it is best for their own interest to stay at home and work their farms.

And of general conditions, he further reports:

The general condition of affairs at this agency shows an improvement over the former year. The Indians seem to take more interest in looking after their own business and are developing a desire for better homes and better ways of living.

Of customs, etc., he says:

The old tribal customs are fast disappearing and are now almost of the past. All of the men wear citizens' clothes, and nearly all of them speak English. The women all wear calico dresses made according to the Indian style, a very neat, modest dress, and suitable in every way to their wants; moccasins and shawls are also worn by them. The morals of these people are good, and they have easily adapted themselves to the legal marriage, and almost ceased marrying according to Indian custom, and where they are married that way first later a legal marriage is performed.

The school superintendent in charge of Siletz Agency, Oreg., reports:

During the current fiscal year I organized a farmers' institute in this agency for the purpose of creating an interest among the Indians in their homes, stock raising, and agriculture. The meetings are well attended. Many Indians take part in the discussions. I have noticed many improvements around their homes; fences rebuilt, gardens planted, and many more fields of oats sown this year than last. A spirit of emulation has been awakened, and I hope for many more good results. Taken altogether the situation is improving and the outlook encouraging.

The school superintendent in charge of the Umatilla Agency, Oreg., reports:

The general condition of the Indians and the reservation is good. Gradual advancement toward civilization continues, and many new houses are being built by the allottees.

The school superintendent in charge of the Flandreau Sioux, of South Dakota, reports:

The general conduct of these people compares favorably with their white neighbors, almost the only offense being that of intemperance.

The agent for Sisseton Agency, S. Dak., reports:

The general condition of the Indians on this reservation has not materially changed since my last annual report was submitted. I believe, however, that there is some improvement from year to year, and that there is a general tendency to greater industry and the adoption of the methods and habits of civilization.

The school superintendent in charge of Shivwits Indian School, Utah, reports:

The Shivwits Indians have made very gratifying progress under the care and with the assistance of the excellent people who live on the farms as missionary and field matron. Increased interest in the construction, furnishing, and care of their houses, and also in the moral and religious welfare of the entire community and their neighbors; improved moral sense whereby they are quick to discern and eager to correct any lapses or misdemeanors; awakened life and hope under intelligent direction and teaching, which enables them to work to better advantage and therefore produce more from their little farms and gardens, are some of the advantages already theirs, with more to follow in the future certainly.

The agent for Uintah and Ouray Agency, Utah, reports:

The Indians of both these reservations will work and do perform a large amount of work, but it is imperative in order to accomplish any great results in this direction that Indians must not be left to their own initiative, for, while they may earn some money of their own volition, they will invariably spend or gamble away what they make without providing for the future in any manner. It seems to have been the policy during the past year to have procured as much work as possible for individual Indians in performing work for the agency and for white men in the vicinity. If a definite piece of work is set out for them, they will, on the whole, accomplish it in a creditable manner, but seem to have no capacity to secure work of their own accord. These Indians seem to be capable of doing creditable work if employed as daily laborers.

The school superintendent in charge of Puyallup Agency, Wash., reports:

The Skokomish Indians have been reasonably prosperous and are improving their allotments quite extensively. They also secure much employment in the logging camps and sawmills near their reservation, and, as they are quite industrious and fair managers, they are doing very nicely. They are very friendly to schools and send their children to the day school on the reservation as promptly and regularly as weather conditions will permit. They also send quite a number to the Puyallup boarding school. The school on that reservation has been quite successful.

The Chehalis Indians are quite prosperous, and, while they are not improving their allotments as much as they might, still they are doing something in that line and are providing for their families by outside labor.

The report of a farmer, Swinomish Reservation, Wash., is as follows:

Our Indians are making fair progress in civilization. They all dress in citizens' clothes. Most of them wear clothing that looks fairly neat and respectable. A majority of them appear to take pride in sending their children to school looking neat and clean. Some of our most progressive farmers have erected very respectable residences on their farms during the past year, which evidences a spirit of progress. The day school here has a civilizing influence over the old people as well as the young.

The superintendent in charge of the Green Bay Agency, Wis., reports:

The Indians are progressing slowly toward civilization and eventual citizenship. They have adapted themselves to the white man's style of dress, and the majority read and speak English. They all occupy comfortable frame or log dwellings furnished with ordinary conveniences for housekeeping. As a rule, their homes are neatly kept and their table well provided. With the exception of the old and decrepit, who receive rations, they are self-supporting. They have demonstrated some ability in the management of their business affairs, and many of them have been quite successful in their logging operations.

The agent at La Pointe, Wis., reports:

It is a great gratification to me and will also be to your Office to note the rapid progress made during the past year by the Indians in agricultural pursuits. Especially is this evident on the Bad River and Red Cliff reservations. While the majority of the Indians on the other reservations have good gardens, hay meadows, and pastures under cultivation, the Bad River and the Red Cliff Indians have commenced farming operations on a larger scale. Once it was fully understood that the money received from the sale of their timber could not be used except for permanent improvements and cases of necessity, these Indians ceased their importunities and commenced clearing their allotments; and now a ride over the reservations shows acre after acre cleared of stumps and brush and seeded to grass or planted with growing crops. Many of them display much thrift and ability in managing these operations.

The agent for Shoshone Agency, Wyo., reports:

The progress in school work of a year ago has more than been maintained during the year just closed. By long and persistent effort every Indian child of school age, of whatever degree of blood, was reported in school except those excused upon a certificate of physical disability from the agency physician. I am informed that this is the first time in the history of this reservation that such a condition has obtained.

More interest is being shown by both tribes in agriculture than was a year ago. Large quantities of seed wheat, oats, and alfalfa were purchased by them from proceeds of grazing leases, and nearly all of same was sown in good season.

More attention is also being given to the raising of horses and cattle.

Of the Potawatomi in Kansas the agent says:

The most notable change in the Indians is their attitude toward the school, and all the change is in its favor. I have not experienced any trouble in keeping up the attendance, which has averaged perhaps the largest of any year in its history, and all accomplished without friction.

At Wadsworth, Nev., the agent says:

During the past year there has been no material change in the affairs of the Indians. They still continue to show a steady advancement toward civilization, and are industrious, and I believe appreciate what is being done to educate their people.

So it goes on, Mr. Chairman. And I will not weary the committee, but I think I will print the record more fully than I have read, extracts from the reports of the agents in substantially all of the States of the Union, showing that the progress of the Indians has been and is steadily forward; that more of them labor, more of them live in their own homes, more of them speak our language, and more of them wear our clothing year after year.

If I may be permitted to quote some remarks I made myself last fall at the Mohonk conference, I will take the figures from the book, which very forcibly demonstrates the truth of what I have been saying, and prove in the broad sense that the specific reports which have been made are justified by the general facts:

In 1882, for instance, when the policy of systematic education was begun, the appropriation for this branch of the service was $135,000, a mere bagatelle; in 1895, only thirteen years afterwards, the appropriation had reached $2,000,000, and in 1903, when the time had simply been that of a man reaching his majority, it had reached $4,000,000. In 1882 there were but 4,000 pupils gathered in inadequate, unsanitary school buildings, with indifferent, as a rule, teachers, not over well qualified; in 1895 the number of pupils had increased to 23,000, school buildings to over 200, modern methods had been employed, teachers had been selected with special reference to their fitness to discharge the duties for which they were employed; in 1903 the total school attendance had reached the great sum of 30,000 pupils. These figures, it seems to me, of themselves demonstrate what has been done along educational lines by this Government of ours as touching on the education, training school for the boys and girls. In many cases rations have been cut off in order to instill the principles of industry into the Indian men and Indian women. In 1882 there were comparatively no Indians in this country at any work; in 1895 8,300 Indian families were cultivating 400,000 acres of land, while in 1903 11,280 families were cultivating 418,000 acres of land. The earnings of these Indians in 1895 was $1,056,000; in 1903 it was $2,100,000. We all know that the agencies are gradually being eliminated, and we all know that that is something that we very much desire to be fully accomplished. We want all the agencies wiped out. In 1895 the Indian population, exclusive of the Indian Territory and Alaska, was 182,000; in 1903 it was 187,000. Meanwhile the leaven of education had been gradually working, and in 1895 81,000 Indians had adopted wholly citizens' dress; 31,000 had adopted it in part; while in 1903—mark you the enormous increase—112,000 Indians had adopted the citizens' dress in whole and 44,000 had adopted it in part, or a very large majority of all the Indians in the country had adopted citizens' dress almost wholly. In 1894 there were 33,000 Indians who could read. In 1903 this number had increased to 50,000—almost one-third of the Indian population of the country. In 1895 there were 41,000 Indians who spoke our language; in 1903 65,000. Twenty-three thousand four hundred and sixty Indians occupied homes in 1895, while in 1903 27,000 Indians found domiciles in the white man's dwelling. In 1895 20,000 Indians were members of churches, and were gathered in church buildings of their own to the number of 270. In 1903 the church membership was 31,000, and the church buildings had to be increased to 371. The full significance of that fact may be better realized when we understand that those buildings were very largely erected by contributions from the Indians' own pocket.

Figures are wearisome, Mr. Chairman, and exceedingly dry, but I think the few I have read should demonstrate to the satisfaction of any Member of the House that the money we have expended for our natural wards during this quarter of a century, and the manner in which we have, as their guardians, disbursed their own funds for their good, has resulted in their being well expended, and that these expenditures have produced ample fruit to justify a contiuance of the policy which is now and has been for the last half dozen years in operation. I believe that present conditions, viewed in the light of those of ten years ago and of twenty years ago, justify anyone in being optimistic upon the Indian question. They justify us all in the belief that at some time—I do not think in the near future, but at some time beyond the ken of any man in this House now living—that the time will come when the great body of the Indian people of this continent will be self-supporting along the lines to which they are best adapted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman kindly state to the House what new legislation there is in this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a very considerable amount of new legislation in the bill which is subject to a point of order if it be raised when the sections are reached. There will be no contention if any gentleman desires to invoke the rule, and the provisions, I assume, will go out—I know they will, because the present Chairman knows the rules as few men in the House know them, and he applies them regardless of where they will hit.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman please explain if there is not express authority in this bill for the diversion of appropriations for supplies——

Mr. SHERMAN. In a way; yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman think that is good policy to authorize by legislation the diversion of appropriations?

Mr. SHERMAN. The diversion to which the gentleman refers is a gratuity for a special purpose, and the bill authorizes that where that is exhausted and another fund looking to the same general end is not exhausted, some portion of that fund may be used.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will not that in effect operate to relieve the Secretary of the Interior from the operation of the antideficiency law which Congress has enacted at this session, by not requiring apportionment so as to prevent deficiencies? This allows him to use the surplus in one fund for the purpose of making up a deficiency in another fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it would, in the first place, and, in the second place, the funds have never been diverted to any considerable extent. Let me say in that connection that, so far as the Indian appropriations are concerned, within the period of time I have been chairman of this committee, of the amounts appropriated by Congress for this service, more than half a million dollars has been turned back into the Treasury. Within ten years more than $500,000 has been turned back into the Treasury.

I am glad the gentleman from Minnesota made the inquiry, because it brings to my mind that I have said nothing about the amount appropriated by this bill. This bill carries $7,785,000, in round numbers, or $400,000 less than the estimates of the Department.

The largest amounts of decrease are the estimates for an irrigation project down on the Gila River in Arizona, and $100,000 in the amount appropriated for the Sioux under the treaty, the Sioux treaty being an elastic one, which provides for the furnishing to the Indians certain specified rations so long as the President deems that they require it, and vesting in the President the authority to use that money where he deems it for the best interests of the Indians. And the President has, through his Secretary of the Interior Department, for some years instead of giving rations to able-bodied Indians, which he has absolutely and wholly refused to do, given the rations only to those who have been unable to work; but the money that has been appropriated has been used to pay to Indians who would work, and then let them use that money for their support, and the result has been that, whereas ten years ago the appropriations to carry out the provisions of this treaty were $1,325,000, up to last year that amount had been reduced $700,000. This year, although the estimate was made for $700,000, the investigation made by the committee in the hearings and by the word of the Representative from South Dakota, who is familiar with conditions there, it was conceded by all that it would be quite possible with the further application of this rule, of compulsory labor to meet our obligations with an expenditure of $600,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to have the chairman of the committee state to the House how much of the money appropriated by this bill is expended for education, and whether or not it is practically all of it a gratuity?

Mr. SHERMAN. About $4,000,000 in round numbers is spent for education, and a very large part of it, I should say seven-eighths of it, is a gratuity. There were certain treaty provisions under which certain schools are provided for, and a large majority of it—I should say seven-eighths—is a gratuity.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the chairman if the laws providing for Indian allotment did not contemplate and provide that the unused lands when disposed of, the money should be paid into the Treasury and expended for the civilization, education, etc., of the Indians rather than to pay them the money in cash, as we have been doing under certain bills that have become laws recently?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; and as a result of that policy and the treaties by which we have acquired title to their land and which we have disposed of for cash, and a large part of which we have disposed of without any consideration by the free-homestead bill—under that policy there is in the Treasury upward of $30,000,000, the income of which at interest of 3, 4, and 5 per cent is expended annually for the benefit of the Indians, and of course is not appropriated for in this bill.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the Secretary of the Interior did not also recommend an irrigation project for the Uintah Indians in Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, there was no estimate made for the Uintah proposition. There was a supplementary report sent in, in which the Secretary recommended the expenditure of $600,000 to provide for the irrigation of the Uintah Reservation, but seemingly that irrigation proposition pointed more to the benefit of the white men, citizens of Utah, than it did to the Indians. The Indians, as their lands are now allotted, occupy the bottom lands along the rivers, lands which are productive, and it seemed to the committee that the irrigation scheme recommended by the Secretary had in view more the betterment of the white citizens than it did the betterment of the red men.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Did not the Secretary recommend, as necessary for the irrigation of the allotted Indian lands that had been selected and allotted in accordance with the provisions of the act of May 27, 1902, allotting to each head of a family 80 acres of land and each member of a tribe 40 acres of land that could be irrigated?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, so that there will be no possible misunderstanding as to what the Secretary did recommend, I will insert here and print in the RECORD the recommendation of the Secretary. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 5, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of your committee, a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 2d instant, with the draft of an item prepared in his office for insertion in the Indian appropriation bill, providing for the construction and completion of irrigation systems to cover allotted lands of the Uncompahgre and the Uintah and White River Utes in Utah, the cost thereof to be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds of sale of lands in the former Uintah and Ouray reservations.

The statements in the Commissioner's letter show the urgent need for the legislation proposed, and I have the honor to recommend that the matter receive the favorable action of your committee and the Congress.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary.

---

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 2, 1906.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: In my annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, stress is laid on the affairs and needs of the Indians of the Uintah and Ouray Agency. In accordance with the law these Indians have been allotted lands in severalty that can be irrigated, provided the necessary works are constructed.

The problem as to these Indians and their future, if not the most serious that has been before the Indian Office, is certainly very important. They number less than 1,500, and prior to September 1, 1905, occupied a reservation of 2,039,040 acres, or 3,186 square miles, more than 2 square miles per capita. By allotment most of them received 80 acres each, but many only 40 acres. Among them are Indians who participated in the Meeker massacre, and it is plain that they are little fitted for the change that has been made in their lives. Indeed, no considerable number of them can hope to hold their own in the struggle for existence unless they are carefully and wisely helped.

Their land is not first-class farming land. Conclusive proof of this is to be found in the fact that the number of entries made on the lands restored is less than 1,300, and many of these have been abandoned.

Under all the circumstances so great a change in the condition of an equal number of intelligent and competent white citizens would cause such a shock as materially to delay their progress, and hence it is a factor to be reckoned with in the development of these Indians for years to come.

Notwithstanding the very unfavorable existing situation and the troubles ahead, I believe that we need not be apprehensive of the ultimate fate of these people if the Government does its full duty by them and their affairs are administered wisely.

Being confined to farms, they must till these fairly well or fail entirely. Local conditions are such that irrigation alone will succeed. Give them water and their lands will produce according to the quality of the soil; without water they have just so many acres of desert. With water they can become self-supporting; without they are bound to become presently a charge upon the community of which their newly acquired citizenship has made them a part. With nothing to do and no means of support, the only path open to them will be that which leads straight to pauperism, or crime, or both.

Aside from the cost of constructing works, several things had to be considered in planning for irrigating these lands. The streams from which the water must be taken afford a greater supply than is necessary during a part of the year, but nothing like enough for the unallotted lands. Therefore it was necessary to take advantage of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905 (33 Stats., 1048), and reserve land on either side of some of the streams to protect the rights of the Indians. This course was the more necessary because the laws of Utah declare that "Beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of all rights to the use of water;" and in addition to the usual requirements as to filing, it further provides that the State engineer, in his indorsement of approval, shall require that work must begin within six months of the date of approval, and that the construction of the proposed works shall be completed within a period of five years from the date of such approval.

Great care was taken, and it is believed that the Indians have been placed on the very best land, having in mind the soil and the cost of carrying water on it, and applications have been filed for water for thirty canals and ditches. They have been surveyed and the work begun on all of them, and about $50,000 has been expended from the general appropriation for Indian irrigation, to the great detriment of other reservations. To complete them will require not less than $600,000, and this must be had within the next four years, or expenditures so far made, or which may be made, will be lost wholly or in part.

The Indians have no money, and there is little likelihood that any will be available in the next year, as the lands entered on the former reservation are to be paid for in five equal yearly payments, the first being due some time in September next, too late for use during the present year. Moreover, the expense of surveying the reservation is to be returned to the United States from the proceeds of sale before anything is available for Indian purposes.

It should be kept in mind also that the settlement and development of the lands restored to the public domain is delayed by the reservations made to protect the Indians' water supply, as necessarily the surplus in the streams can not be had by the settlers. If their canals were permitted to reach the streams protected, the water necessary for irrigating allotted lands would be lost, for there is more land than water.

Probably the sale of the surplus lands will in time afford means to construct irrigation works, but until the works are constructed it does not seem probable that the lands can be sold, for settlers can not live five years without a crop.

The wisest course, and by all means the cheapest, would be for Congress to appropriate the amount needed, to be reimbursed from the proceeds derived from the sale of the former reservation lands. Indeed, it seems necessary to do so in order to save the Government from becoming almsgiver in perpetuity to these Indians.

I have therefore caused a draft of an item to be prepared, appropriating the full amount necessary to complete the irrigation systems, in order that work may not be delayed at any stage for lack of funds. Time is of the utmost importance, and money should be available at an early date. The item is inclosed, and I respectfully suggest its transmittal to the proper committees of Congress with a recommendation that it be inserted in the Indian appropriation bill.

Very respectfully,

F. E. LEUPP, Commissioner.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question or two in relation to the Indians in Alaska. I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement made by the gentleman respecting the gratifying progress that Indians generally have made toward accommodating themselves to the white man's civilization, but what is the situation of the Indians in Alaska and how is their welfare being looked after?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have no Indian agent in Alaska. We never have provided any gratuity for the Alaska Indians. We formerly provided that of the general school fund, $5,000 might be used for the education of the Indians there, but the Indians of Alaska are practically self-supporting. Now, just how well they are supported is quite a question. I am not sure whether or not the gentleman visited Alaska with other members of the House last summer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I did not.

Mr. SHERMAN. But there seemed to be a difference of opinion among those gentlemen who viewed the situation themselves. However, I saw no gentleman who made any assertion other than this, That at least all of the Alaskan Indians whom they saw were industrious, that they were employed in some capacity there, either in the canning factories or in fishing or hunting and selling furs and skins or in selling their little trinkets when the excursion boats came along. They were all busy and occupied in some way.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then the policy of the Federal Government toward the Indians in the States and the Territories is not applied to the Indians in Alaska at all, I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; they have never come under the head of ration Indians.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They live in tribal relations to some extent, do they not?

Mr. SHERMAN. To some extent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And have a tribal government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, most of those Indians have drifted over from British Columbia. They are not natural United States Indians, anyway.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suppose in the main those who are independent, who are not under tribal government, are citizens of the United States, then?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, unless they become citizens under the general citizen provision they would not be.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course that is a question of law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that in Alaska an Indian can not take up any Government land or mining claim, because he is not regarded as a citizen, and there are no tribal relations in southeastern Alaska among any of the Indians in that part of Alaska.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are no distinctly tribal relations in Alaska anywhere. If the gentleman cares to hear it, I will read the citizenship law which applies to Indians. It is found on page 35 of volume 1 of the Laws and Treaties, as prepared by Keppler, published by the Government:

Every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States to whom allotments shall have been made under the provisions of this act or under any law or treaty, and every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up within said limits his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein and has adopted the habits of civilized life is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States and is entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems to me, then, from the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], that the Alaska Indians are segregated and live practically independent lives, that a great injustice is done to them in withholding from them the right to homestead lands and to take up mining claims. It seems to me that some policy—some, perhaps, adaptive Indian policy—ought to be applied to Alaska. The Indians that are natives there who are engaged in the various industries of the Territories certainly ought to have the privilege of citizenship in so far as it pertains to the right of homestead and to take up mining claims. I did not know a condition of that sort existed in that Territory. It is manifestly unjust and it ought to be remedied, but the Committee on Indian Affairs may not have jurisdiction to report the necessary remedial legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I may say to the gentleman from Indiana, the policy of the committee, and I believe it is the policy of the House, is wherever it is possible to refrain from giving any gratuity to Indians, because it has been discovered wherever rations were withdrawn, wherever gratuities were withheld, wherever education and labor were enforced, there the Indians progressed, and, Indians differing not so much from other citizens, where food was placed before them without effort from themselves, little effort was exerted and progress was retarded.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, it seems in Alaska the Indians have practically abandoned the tribal relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. They practically never had any, because they came over there from British Columbia in bunches.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They are self-supporting and independent. Their support levies no charge upon the Federal Government. Now, to give them the ordinary rights to take homesteads, to cultivate farms, to take up mining claims, so they may prosper industrially, can not certainly be called a gratuity.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course, if the gentleman had been to Alaska, he would know the number of farming claims there would be about as few as hens' teeth; but there are mining properties that can be filed upon.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Indians there now are absolutely subject to the domination of the Americans. They can not take mining claims, they can not acquire homesteads, however poor they may be, and therefore they must under this system eternally and perpetually be subject industrially and every other way to the citizens of the country who live there.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are aliens, most of these people. They can not become citizens under the law. A great majority of them were not born within the limits of our territory.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, it seems to me that the policy of this Government ought to be to provide for ultimate citizenship for every alien even that it admits within its borders. It is not good policy to have a large alien population in the country, to encourage or permit it to come, and withhold from it the rights and privileges and responsibilities of American citizenship.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not disagree with the gentleman in that statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Indiana while I was in Alaska two years ago my attention was called to the fact that under the law passed by Congress known as the "homestead law" a citizen of the United States came into southeastern Alaska and saw a very attractive place occupied by a native. The native's father had occupied it before him; his grandfather had occupied it before him. Under the provisions of our beneficent homestead law for Alaska he filed on that homestead, that ancestral home of that native, and took it away from him because the native was not a citizen and could not become a citizen under our laws.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no doubt an Alaskan Indian who has established and maintained a home in that Territory under existing law is subject to be driven from his own home at the will of any citizen who goes there and covets his place. I think under the law there is absolutely no encouragement offered to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are two provisions in the bill, one for establishing an Indian reformatory and the other for ascertaining the advisability of creating a sanitarium for the treatment of tuberculous patients?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York first if he thinks it advisable to create any additional distinctively Indian institutions?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it advisable not to erect a new institution, but I think it advisable to take some institution which now exists and apply it for the purposes suggested in the provision to which the gentleman refers. Of course, when you have 30,000 children of school age, it matters not what their color is, what their nationality is, or what their environment has been, there is more or less of evil, of crime, in that great body, and unless that is curbed, unless there be some restraining influence, there is fear that it will spread. It originated with the Commissioner; it did not originate with the committee; and it is to provide a training school, compulsory, confined within prescribed limits, where children who have become habitually refractory in other institutions can be confined, if possible, until discharged by continuous good conduct, under such terms and regulations as the Department and Secretary should provide.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this a fact, that it appears after the establishment and maintenance for a number of years of educational institutions for Indian children it becomes necessary to create a reform school and to put the pupils from these educational institutions into it?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not appear by reason of the fact that we have educated them; no. The condition existed, in my judgment, to a greater and more aggravated extent before we had schools, but it has become visible by reason of our schools, and has become the more apparent because you have put the evil doer beside the well doer, and make the evil conspicuous by close comparison with the good.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am led to make this inquiry largely as a result of the experience of the Indian Committee with another distinctively Indian institution—namely, an insane asylum. That insane asylum was erected and $25,000 a year, as I recollect, appropriated annually to maintain it, and it had about sixteen inmates there a year; and finally it was necessary, in order to give an excuse for the continuance of this institution, to extend the territory and the peoples from which the asylum might recruit its inmates. Now, if we establish distinctively Indian reform schools will not the result be that it will be necessary to seek out Indian children who might perhaps be better off if never put into a reform school in order to maintain the school?

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman's long and valuable service on the Indian Committee has made him familiar with all Indian questions and also with the history of legislation for several years back, and the gentleman knows that the creation and continuance of this insane asylum was always aggravating not only to the other members of the committee but to the chairman, and the gentleman knows how the institution was originally created. It was created by an amendment, made somewhere else in the world, to the bill, and the suggestion was made by the representative of another body somewhere in the world that unless that provision remained in the bill there would be no Indian appropriation bill in a certain year. It is a fact that it costs us more per capita to care for the insane in that asylum than we could have certainly equally well cared for them in any one of the State institutions in the land. And let me say to the gentleman, if he noticed the phraseology of this provision, it does not provide for setting aside an Indian school or a training school, but setting aside an institution, and I will say to the gentleman that at the time that provision was drawn I had in mind setting aside this insane asylum for a training school and thereby saving the Government some money and doing some good for this race.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the language of the bill it would be possible to set aside the insane asylum for the purpose, provided that there were no inmates there. The gentleman would hardly desire the insane asylum as an incident or as a part of the reform school?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not as any part of the institution, but doing away with the institution as an insane asylum and caring for the few Indian insane—and there are not very many—in some State institution; of course, the Government paying therefor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would it not be better, instead of authorizing what may eventually result in a great Indian reform school, to authorize the department to have refractory Indian pupils in the schools placed in State institutions for reform of the young?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am rather inclined to disagree with that suggestion. I rather think it would be better to do as we suggest here, to have a school where these Indians would not be thrown in with incorrigibles of the white race. It is bad enough to have the incorrigibles of their own race as their associates, but where they will be cared for with those of their own race and will not learn anything bad that they otherwise would not possibly know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I doubt if there are many bad white young men and girls that can teach a bad Indian any evil.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad that the gentleman finished the sentence. I thought he started out to say that he thought there were no bad white girls and boys, and knowing he came from Brooklyn, I thought he would not well make any such statement as that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can safely say that of my section. The other provision is looking to the establishment of a tuberculosis hospital.

Mr. SHERMAN. The indisputable fact is that tuberculosis is very prevalent among the red people. Some people who inveigh against the larger contract schools, like Haskell and Carlisle, say that tuberculosis prevails because the Indians are taken from one climate to another. But I think an analysis of the facts will disclose that tuberculosis comes more from this condition of affairs: Up in the northern country, where the winters are severe, the Indians live in very contracted quarters—a whole family perhaps in one hut, with one or two rooms, and they will plaster it up inside and out with mud, and very often it will be partially under ground; and they will stay in there, with a stove or a fire in there, so that the thermometer will be too high for the health of any human being; and when the early spring comes they go out and they fail to take care of themselves. They have not the proper, comfortable clothing, and the parents have not been educated to properly care for their children, and they naturally drift from cold into tuberculosis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless some one wants to ask me a question, I will not consume any more time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. My time is exhausted and you take your hour now.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of the Philippine tariff bill in the early days of this session provoked general discussion of the merits or demerits, benefits or injuries, blessing or burdens, of high protective tariff, for which the majority of this House stands and upon which many gentlemen "stand pat."

I am by no means persuaded, nor do I even indulge a hope, that anything can be said or done here which will induce our friends on the other side of the aisle to respond to the appeals of the great mass of American citizens, so often and so urgently presented, pleading for relief from some, at least, of the onerous, oppressive, unjust, and unjustifiable impositions of the present high-tariff law.

We hear gentlemen proclaim that they are "not wedded to the schedules" in the Dingley Act, and even concede and admit that some rates are too high. But with a defiance which would merit admiration if it were not so intolerant and arrogant they stubbornly ignore these petitions, and, wrapped in their own conception of the infallibility of their wisdom, they assume that the people do not know what is best for them. They repeat the old, old story of the wondrous and marvelous achievements of high tariff, boasting that it has brought us unprecedented, widespread, universal prosperity, and therefore the rates in the Dingley bill must not and shall not be molested.

Many interesting and valuable contributions have been made to the reasons urged and relied upon in support of the doctrine of protection; none more interesting or valuable, however, than the contributions of the able and distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who always faithfully, intelligently, and courageously presents the most cogent reasons and the strongest arguments of his party, and of the "stand-patters"—of which he is chief—in particular, for its attitude and their attitude on this important and vital subject.

In his great speech delivered January 11 he used a table compiled by Francis Curtis, a part of which I shall read as a basis for some observations:

| Law of— | Reason for revision. | Time consumed. | Nature of change. | Result. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1846 | To satisfy the southern free traders. | 3½ months.. | Free trade and ad valorem duties. | Ruinous |
| 1857 | To decrease the revenue and still further satisfy the South. | 6 months... | Further decrease | Bankruptcy |
| 1861 | First Republican tariff for revenue and protection. | 11 months.. | Increase ..... | Beneficial |
| 18611862186318641865 | To meet requirements of war. | Passed promptly. | General increases | Do. |
| 1867 | To help wool and woolen industries. | 7 months... | Upward changes | Do. |
| 1870 | To establish new industries, especially iron and steel. | 4 months... | $28 per ton on steel rails. | Do. |
| 1872 | To conciliate "reformers." | 3 months... | 10 per cent reduction. | Injurious |
| 1875 | To correct act of 1872.... | 1 month.... | Repeal of 10 per cent reduction. | Beneficial |
| 1883 | To conciliate revisionists | 2 months... | Reduction and increased free list. | Injurious |
| 1890 | To meet existing conditions. | 5½ months.. | Increase and specific rates. | Beneficial |
| 1894 | To try free trade ..... | 8 months... | Large reduction, free wool, etc. | Ruinous |
| 1897 | To provide revenue and to protect our failing industries. | 5 months... | Substantial increase. | Beneficial |

Apparently, almost persuaded by the conclusions of Mr. Curtis, and thoroughly and unalterably convinced by the irresistible logic of his own argument, the gallant leader from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], after hurling a "deliberate challenge to gentlemen on the other side of this question," continued:

It is the imperishable record of more than one hundred and twenty-five years that the American people prosper under high tariffs and suffer under low tariffs.

I accept his challenge and deny the propositions so boldly asserted and so ingeniously and eloquently defended. Statistics do not and will not justify and support the gentleman's contentions, but, on the contrary, they conclusively, emphatically, and overwhelmingly contradict them, as I shall attempt to show.

The Walker, or Democratic, tariff, enacted in 1846, was in force until 1857, when an act was passed reducing tariff rates, and this act was in effect until 1861. The gentleman quotes, with approval, the conclusions of Mr. Curtis that the Walker tariff was "ruinous" and the act of 1857 was "bankruptcy."

In 1861 the Morrill bill, the first protective-tariff law, was enacted, followed by various other measures, each in turn increasing the rates of duty and giving higher protection, which continued until 1870. The gentleman says these were all "beneficial."

In 1870 still higher rates of duty were imposed. In 1872 the tariff law was amended and duties lowered to please "reformers," as alleged, by making an "injurious" reduction of 10 per cent.

The act of 1872 was repealed in 1875, thus restoring the high tariff law of 1870, which continued in operation until 1883.

The Commission appointed by President Arthur in 1883 reported a measure making slight reductions in the law of 1870, and this bill was passed and remained in force until 1890, when the McKinley bill, imposing the highest rates up to that date, was enacted.

In 1897 the Wilson-Gorman law was repealed and the Dingley bill enacted, which is the highest tariff measure ever passed by Congress. This law is now in force, and the gentleman says it is "beneficial."

To sum the whole matter up in few words, I feel justified in saying we had revenue tariffs from 1846 to 1861 and have had protective tariffs since that date.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will read a table prepared from official statistics.

Comparison of the estimated valuation of the national wealth of the United States and the valuation of farm property.

| Year. | Estimated national wealth. | | Value of all farm property. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Total. | Increase. | Total. | Increase. |
| | | Per cent. | | Per cent. |
| 1850 | $7,135,780,228 | ---------- | $3,967,343,580 | ---------- |
| 1860 | 16,159,616,068 | 126.46 | 7,980,493,063 | 101.15 |
| 1870 | 30,068,518,507 | 86.07 | 8,899,966,578 | 11.52 |
| 1880 | 43,642,000,000 | 45.14 | 12,180,501,538 | 36.84 |
| 1890 | 65,037,091,197 | 49.02 | 16,082,267,689 | 32.03 |
| 1900 | 95,000,000,000 | 45.90 | 20,439,901,164 | 27.09 |

These figures show that from 1850 to 1860, under alleged "ruinous" and "bankruptcy" tariff laws, our national wealth increased over 126 per cent; from 1860 to 1870, under moderate protection, it increased over 86 per cent; from 1870 to 1880, under higher tariff, a little over 45 per cent; from 1880 to 1890, under still higher tariff, only 49 per cent, while from 1890 to 1900, under the "beneficial" influence of the highest tariff we ever had, the increase was only 45 per cent—the lowest per cent of increase in any census period in fifty years of national life.

From 1850 to 1860, under Democratic tariff, the value of farm property increased over 100 per cent, but from that time to this hour the per cent of increase in the value of farm property has steadily decreased, with each ten years, until it was only 27 per cent from 1890 to 1900—the lowest of any period in the last fifty years, except that covering our great civil war. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These figures also show that in 1850 the value of farm property in the United States was $400,000,000, more than one-half of the total wealth of this Republic. In 1860 farm property represented nearly one-half of our total wealth and in 1870 nearly one-third. With each succeeding period since 1860 the tariff has leaped higher and higher, and the relative value of farm property has sunken lower and lower, until in 1900 the value of all farm property was only a little more than one-fifth of our national wealth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In 1880 over 74 per cent of all the farms in the United States were occupied and operated by owners. In 1900, after twenty years of the kind of "unprecedented prosperity" that comes from high protection, the small farm owner disappeared and made way for the tenant, and the result is that the number of farms operated by owners was reduced to 64 per cent.

I have prepared another table showing the increase in acreage of improved farm lands and the increase in value of live stock from 1850 to 1900.

Statement showing increase in acreage of improved farm lands and value of live stock, 1850–1900.

| Year. | Acreage of improved farm lands. | Increase. | Value of live stock. | Increase. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | Per cent. | | Per cent. |
| 1850 | 113,032,614 | | $544,180,516 | |
| 1860 | 163,110,720 | 44.30 | 1,089,329,915 | 100.17 |
| 1870 | 188,921,099 | 15.82 | 1,220,221,166 | 12.01 |
| 1880 | 284,771,042 | 50.73 | 1,576,884,707 | 29.22 |
| 1890 | 357,616,755 | 25.57 | 2,308,767,573 | 46.41 |
| 1900 | 414,498,487 | 15.90 | 3,075,477,703 | 33.20 |

This table shows that from 1850 to 1860, when Democratic tariff for revenue was in operation, the increase in the number of improved acres added to our farms was over 44 per cent, while from 1890 to 1900, under high-protective tariff, it was only 15 per cent.

From 1850 to 1860 the value of live stock on the farms increased over 100 per cent—more than double in value—while in the last census period the increase was only 33 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read a table compiled from the Abstract of the Twelfth Census, under the title of "Manufactures."

| | Date of census. | | | Per cent of increase. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | 1900. | 1890. | 1880. | 1890 to 1900. | 1880 to 1890. |
| Number of establishments | 512,276 | 355,405 | 253,852 | 44.1 | 40.0 |
| Capital | $9,831,493,500 | $6,525,050,759 | $2,790,272,606 | 50.7 | 133.8 |
| Wage-earners (average number) | 5,314,539 | 4,251,535 | | 25.0 | 55.6 |
| Total wages | $2,327,295,545 | $1,891,209,696 | $947,953,795 | 23.1 | 99.5 |
| Men at least 16 years old | 4,114,348 | 3,326,964 | | 23.7 | |
| Wages | $2,019,954,204 | $1,659,215,858 | | 21.7 | |
| Women at least 16 years old | 1,031,608 | 803,688 | | 28.4 | |
| Wages | $281,679,649 | $215,367,976 | | 30.8 | |
| Children under 16 years old | 168,583 | 120,885 | | 39.5 | |
| Wages | $25,661,692 | $16,625,862 | | 54.3 | |
| Value of products | $13,010,036,514 | $9,372,378,843 | $5,369,597,191 | 38.8 | 74.5 |

These are interesting statistics. To my mind, they conclusively refute the argument that a protective tariff is essential and necessary to maintain confidence and keep alive the fires in furnaces and make the wheels of industry revolve. They show that from 1880 to 1890, most of the time under the operation of a tariff enacted, as alleged, to "conciliate revisionists," and condemned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] as "injurious," capital seeking investment in manufacturing industries increased over 133 per cent, while in the ten years following, under the salutary and "beneficial" influences of the Dingley tariff, the increase in capital thus invested was only 50 per cent. They show more than this. The value of the output or products of our manufacturing concerns increased over 74 per cent between 1880 and 1890 and only 38 per cent between 1890 and 1900. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

True, we had a protective tariff from 1880 to 1890 as well as from 1890 to 1900, but it is also true that the average rate of duty was much higher during the latter period. What, then, becomes of the argument that high tariff is necessary to stimulate and encourage manufacture? These statistics prove that protected industries were more attractive to capital and thrived better under a lower tariff than they do under the higher schedules of the Dingley law.

But the ingenuity of the advocates of protection must not be overlooked. They profess an ardent interest in the welfare of the wage-earner, and plead almost pathetically that Republican high protection is a great boon to that large and respectable class of American citizens. I deny it. It is a burden and a curse to every laboring man in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I shall again refer to the table read by me a few minutes ago, and by the authentic figures there given I show that instead of receiving higher remuneration for his toil the wage-earner actually receives a lower wage under the Dingley Act than he did when we were not burdened with so much so-called "protection."

The average wage of men, women, and children employed in manufacturing establishments in 1890, before the enactment of the Dingley law, was $444.82 per annum. With all the boasted protection afforded the man of toil by the benign and "beneficial" provisions of the Dingley tariff and the hypocritical cant of the Republican party about maintaining a high standard of American labor, the fact is, that in 1900 the average wage paid by these highly protected industries was $6.91 per capita less per annum than was paid in 1890.

This amount is not very large when considered with reference to the pay of one man, but when taken from the earnings of each of over five million wage-earners aggregates the enormous sum of $36,723,464. This represents the exact amount taken from the pockets of labor in a single year by a lot of bounty-fed, tariff-eating cormorants with the aid, consent, and connivance of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Not only are manufacturers enabled to reduce wages at their own sweet will and pleasure and thus prey upon men who are compelled to toil for daily bread, but Republican policies are directly responsible for the existence and rapidly increasing number of trusts and monopolies, which have absolute control over prices of most articles and commodities of necessary daily use and consumption. The cost of these articles is higher under the Dingley tariff than before its enactment.

In Bulletin No. 59, issued by the Bureau of Labor in July, 1905, I find this statement:

"The price of all the more important articles was higher in 1904 than the average for the ten-year period, 1890 to 1899. Bacon was 37.9 per cent higher, eggs 30.9 per cent higher, dry or pickled pork 25.8 per cent higher, fresh pork 24 per cent higher, corn meal 21.5 per cent higher, potatoes 21.3 per cent higher, chickens 20.7 per cent higher, flour 19.9 per cent higher, salt ham 18.4 per cent higher."

These conclusions, reached after a most careful and thorough investigation, are fully justified by this table contained in Dun's Review of recent date.

| Classes of commodities. | Wholesale cost— | | Increase. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | July 1, 1897. | July 1, 1905. | |
| | | | Per ct. |
| Breadstuffs | $10.59 | $18.83 | 77.87 |
| Meats | 7.53 | 8.61 | 14.41 |
| Dairy and garden products | 8.71 | 9.98 | 14.55 |
| Other food articles | 7.89 | 9.92 | 25.80 |
| Clothing | 13.81 | 17.99 | 30.26 |
| Metals | 11.64 | 15.92 | 36.71 |
| Miscellaneous | 12.29 | 17.06 | 38.84 |
| Total | 72.46 | 98.31 | 35.69 |

This table, the result of careful and skillful investigation and computation, is supposed to represent the average annual consumption of one average person. If these figures are accurate, as I believe they are, the increase in the cost of living from July 1, 1897, to July 1, 1905, is $25.85 for each person, or $129.25 for each family of five persons per annum. But the producers did not get this increase, nor any part of it, as I will show before I conclude. The trusts, the creatures of the Republican party, and bearing a commission from that party to pilfer and rob, took it all—simply stole it.

Our Republican friends are wont to glorify themselves and extol their assumed political virtues, because in this great country, with its vast undeveloped domain, its countless millions of treasure yet hidden away in the bowels of the earth, its fertile and prolific soil, its superb climate, and its matchless citizenship, because here in free America a poor man can find work. They did not create these conditions. Men found abundance of profitable employment before the advent of the Republican party.

Every man should perform work of some kind, and every able-bodied, industrious, sober, and economical man ought to be able, and under fair and honest conditions is able, to earn a support for those dependent upon him. This, however, is next to impossible under a ruinous policy which, year by year, increases the cost of living and decreases the rate of wages—a policy which forces women and little children into the great workshops of the country.

Statistics I have read show that between 1890 and 1900 the number of men employed in manufacturing industries increased only 23 per cent, while the number of women thus employed increased over 28 per cent, and the number of children under 16 years of age increased nearly 40 per cent.

From 1850 to 1860, under Democratic tariff for revenue, the increase in the number of adult male wage-earners employed in protected industries was over 42 per cent, but under your Dingley rates it is only 23 per cent. To-day one-fourth of all the labor in the great industrial workshops is performed by women, and a large part of the other three-fourths is done by children.

If there is satisfaction or glory in this condition, you are responsible for it, are welcome to it. We have had no guilty participation with you in producing it, and we absolve ourselves from all responsibility.

You have promised the workingman much. Your promises were recorded in shifting sand. You pledged him loyal friendship, but you have shamelessly violated your obligations. His children have appealed to you for the bread of hope, and you have scornfully thrown them the stone of despair. You have robbed his home and his children of wife and mother, and driven her to delve and toil in a treadmill for bread. You have denied his infant children the guardianship of a mother's watchful care.

Think of it! An increase during the last census period of 40 per cent in the number of children under 16 years of age forced into sweat shops to earn their bread. This means that 40 per cent more of poor men's children are taken from school and denied education; 40 per cent more to whom the avenues of hope are closed; 40 per cent more doomed by your accursed policy to be forever just what you make them—mere "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for a lot of insatiate, heartless oppressors, "who reap where they have not sown" and grow rich upon the unrewarded labor of men, women, and children. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I now read a table prepared from information obtained at the Census Bureau and from the Abstract of the Twelfth Census:

| | 1890. | 1900. | Increase. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | | | Per cent. |
| Mortgage indebtedness in the United States | $6,019,679,985 | $8,394,728,733 | 39.48 |
| Number of mortgaged homes in the United States | 1,696,890 | 2,361,606 | 39.11 |
| Per cent of families in United States owning free homes | 34.4 | 31.8 | ..... |

These statistics show that mortgage indebtedness in the United States increased nearly 40 per cent between 1890 and 1900; that the number of mortgaged homes increased over 39 per cent, while the percentage of families owning free homes decreased nearly 3 per cent.

If mortgage indebtedness is indicative of "unprecedented" prosperity, and mortgaged homes a condition to be desired and for which men strive, then, indeed, should we place a wreath upon the brow of the Republican party as an expression of a nation's gratitude. The statistics I have read show that for each and every manufacturing industry established between 1890 and 1900 the Republican party has forced a mortgage for $15,141.10 upon the homes of American citizens.

Not only this, but by its unjust tariff law the Republican party has virtually pledged and mortgaged our energies and productive capacity—even manhood itself—to the tariff barons and trusts, to have and to hold to their sole separate use and benefit so long as that party is permitted by a confiding people to plunder and rob them.

Mr. Chairman, the assertion that a nation enjoys the greatest measure of prosperity when its people are burdened most is false in theory and untrue in fact. The life of a nation is its commerce. Commerce is trade—an exchange of commodities. Trade unfettered, except to the extent of contributing its reasonable proportion to the support of government, is necessarily more widespread and beneficial in its results than trade hampered and shackled. The safe and true test that should appeal to every patriotic lawmaker and govern and control his official course is, Will this law afford the "greatest good to the greatest number?" If any enactment has been written in the statute which does not measure up to this just standard, it should be amended or repealed.

This leads me to say the Dingley law ought to be amended, and amended now. It imposes burdens upon the masses that they should not bear. True, it has added millions and perhaps billions to the wealth of the few who are its beneficiaries; but it is equally true that every dollar of those millions was first produced by the toil and sweat of men who, under the sanction of law, were deprived of the fruits of their labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A tariff above the revenue point must depend for its existence upon one of two theories, both of which are radically wrong. It must be upon the theory that it is the part of wisdom and good statesmanship to exercise the taxing power of government to extort tribute from all the people for the sole benefit of the few who are engaged in unprofitable business, in order that they may continue a failing business and at the same time grow rich upon the earnings of others, or it must be on the theory that it is right and just and patriotic to thus use the power of government for the selfish and mercenary interests of those who are conducting a profitable business. I deny both propositions. If any man, or set of men, combination, syndicate, or trust is running an unprofitable business—one which can not stand alone—let him or them or it abandon that business. It is neither right nor just, neither patriotic nor honest to levy upon the industry of the masses for the benefit of those whose coffers are already overflowing with wealth cruelly and heartlessly wrung from toiling millions.

If protection was ever right it is not right now. It is a fact of common knowledge, susceptible of demonstration, that American industries not only have a monopoly of our great and rapidly increasing domestic trade, but they can even dominate and control the markets of the world, without tariff protection.

The value of domestic manufactures exported in 1904 amounted to more than $450,000,000. All of this was sold at a profit in open competition with like articles of foreign production, and much of it, perhaps all of it, sold at prices varying from 20 to 40 per cent less than domestic consumers were required to pay for the same goods. If our manufacturers can successfully compete with foreign producers in foreign lands, what single logical reason can be assigned for continuing the existing high and exorbitant rates of the Dingley tariff? Against whom and against what do our industries need protection? Is it against the importation of iron and steel and their products? Why, in 1905 we exported these to the value of $142,928,513. Would they be protected against foreign producers of steel rails? We exported over 400,000 tons of rails in 1901, and a large quantity every year, though I have not the figures. And in this connection let me say it is an open secret that American-made rails are being sold at a profit beyond the borders of the United States and across the waters at $8 per ton less than they are sold at home. Permit me to say further that the President of the United States, always strenuous and generally courageous, was forced and compelled to abandon and retreat from the position of lofty patriotism occupied by him recently—was captured, subdued, and gagged by the steel trust—and now, in silence and deep humiliation, he witnesses this gigantic national robber take from the Treasury $27 per ton for all the steel rails needed in Panama, when foreign producers would gladly deliver them at $20 per ton. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And this Congress, or the majority party in this Congress, is so obedient and subservient to the arbitrary demands and dictation of this mighty trust that you dare not and will not raise your voice in behalf of your constituents, whom you know are being robbed of at least $7, in this instance alone, on every ton of rails used in Panama. Is the steel trust so sacred as to command your veneration? Or is the filthy lucre it has wrung by oppression from millions of your constituents so potential and powerful in political campaigns in your districts that you are compelled to listen in awe and tremble with cowardly fear when it issues its mandate for you to follow? Be sure, my friends, that you do not dispose of your political birthright for a mess of steel-trust tariff pottage. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do our manufacturers require protection on nails and spikes? In 1905 we exported these to the amount of nearly two and a half million dollars and imported none.

Do they need protection on lumber and the products of lumber? In 1904 we exported these to the value of over $65,000,000.

Do manufacturers of linotype or composing machines need the 45 per cent of protection afforded by the Dingley Act? These manufacturers are amply protected by patent laws of the United States, and without tariff protection can sell their machines at a great profit. The tariff of 45 per cent is prohibitory. It prohibits the importation of similar machines, thus giving to one concern—the Mergenthaler Company—absolute monopoly.

Power lodged in the hands of any one person or one company, without restraint or limitation, is invariably used to oppress. We have approximately 20,000 publications, each and every one of which must continue to apply old methods to their business or become helpless victims to the greed and avarice of the Mergenthaler Linotype Company. It has been shown by competent expert testimony that these machines are manufactured at a cost of about $500 each, and yet purchasers are obliged to pay the exorbitant and ruinous price of $3,000. This amounts to legalized robbery of every progressive newspaper and publishing company in the United States and is an unwarranted and unjustifiable tax, in its last analysis, upon the millions of American citizens who read.

This Congress has received thousands of petitions from editors and publishers throughout the country, representing millions of readers, urging the removal of this prohibitory and monopolistic tariff. Will you heed these petitions? If you do not, and I know you will not, every Republican editor in the United States with as much spinal column as an angle worm ought to unite in making it so exceedingly and uncomfortably warm for you next November that you will cry out in anguish of soul—

> Me miserable; which way I fly is hell,
> Myself am hell.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, this Republic, the beacon light of nations, excellent beyond compare in its boundless and limitless resources, grand and glorious in its splendid progress and all its mighty achievements, finds its crowning triumph and its glory in the production of those prime necessities of life, its farm products.

For forty-five years we have been burdened, fettered, and manacled with protective-tariff laws, enacted to foster, encourage, and promote the interests of American manufacture. During this long period protected industries have contributed only 19.54 per cent of the vast total volume of our domestic export trade, while the unprotected farms have contributed the magnificent proportion of 72.92 per cent—nearly three-fourths of it all.

In his report for 1903 Secretary Wilson uses this language:

> During the last fourteen years there was a balance of trade in favor of farm products, without excepting any year, that amounted to $4,806,000,000. Against this was an adverse balance of trade in products other than those of the farm of $865,000,000, and the farmers not only canceled this immense obligation, but had enough left to place $3,940,000,000 to the credit of the nation when the books of international exchange were balanced.
> These figures tersely express the immense national reserve-sustaining powers of the farmers of the country under present quantities of production. It is the farmers who have paid the foreign bondholders.

Notwithstanding the inestimable value of farm products and the incalculable millions they have added to our national wealth, that great army of wealth producers—the 11,000,000 men of brawn and muscle engaged in agricultural pursuits—are the especial victims of your tariff discriminations. You go into hysterics over the welfare of protected industries, lest some one licensed by your pernicious policy to rob should be required to withdraw his polluted hand from other people's pockets, but you are unmoved at conditions you yourselves have produced which hourly menace the future welfare of this Republic.

Let foreign countries retaliate on account of your prohibitory tariff as Germany now threatens to do and you may ultimately witness the saddest and darkest day in the life of this nation. Destroy the farms, as your policy is doing, and you will have accomplished the monumental folly of destroying the source from whence comes the golden egg of national prosperity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen occasionally argue that farmers are benefited by high tariff. We heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] say he would abandon his bill to put hides on the free list if convinced that farmers are benefited by the tariff, which he seriously doubted. Then the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] sprang to the rescue of the cause of protection and, confessing that he "happens to be a farmer," assured us that in the last three or four years he has invariably received about $1 more per hide than he did before the Dingley bill was enacted. The Dingley law has been in operation nine years, and, resting the case on the voluntary confession of the "farmer" from New Jersey, it took five or six years for a benefit equal to $1 per beef hide to reach the farmer, and in the meantime the beef trust has succeeded in almost stealing the beef. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am very grateful to the gentleman for assurances that the trust did not take the hide also. But, Mr. Chairman, beef hides are not the chief product of the American farm. I would be glad if some gentleman on this floor or elsewhere would explain the cause, in this era of great prosperity and high tariff, of the depreciation in the value of cattle and the great cereal crops. Why is it that, with more people to feed than ever before in the history of the world, these products, so indispensable and necessary to life, are declining in value? Statistics justify the statement that for several years the price of beef cattle has been gradually falling. To-day the seller must accept from 75 cents to $1 less per hundred pounds than the average price for the last ten years. At this rate the loss to cattle raisers is from $9 to $12 on every 1,200-pound steer.

We slaughter 7,000,000 cattle annually. A loss of $9 per head entails a total loss to cattle raisers in one year on fat cattle alone of $63,000,000. But, as the same conditions affect the value of stock cattle, too, it is a fair and conservative estimate to say that by reason of falling prices the farmers are being victimized in the sale of cattle at the rate of at least $100,000,000 every year. This is high-tariff prosperity, the kind of prosperity the farmer gets.

Let us examine a little further. I have prepared a table of average prices of the great cereal crops in ten-year periods, to which I respectfully invite the attention of "stand-patters" particularly. These figures are obtained from Government statistics, and they show a disastrous decline in the prices of farm products.

Statement showing, in cents, the average price per bushel of farm products for ten-year periods, 1875–1904.

| Ten-year periods. | Corn. | Wheat. | Oats. | Rye. | Barley. | Buckwheat |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1875 to 1884 | 41.45 | 94.12 | 33.08 | 64.46 | 63.59 | 66.82 |
| 1885 to 1894 | 38.90 | 70.93 | 30.68 | 56.32 | 51.03 | 56.09 |
| 1895 to 1904 | 35.52 | 67.01 | 27.20 | 50.79 | 40.48 | 52.18 |
| Difference in average price | 3.38 | 3.92 | 3.48 | 5.53 | 10.55 | 3.91 |

Here we find conclusive proof that the value of farm products has steadily declined for thirty years—ever since the devil inspired the unhallowed doctrine of protection and found gentlemen representing special interests to proclaim and support it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As tariff rates have risen from time to time, prices of our great staples have fallen. The aggregate loss sustained by producers in the last thirty years is so appalling in amount that its recital would stifle imagination and defy comprehension.

I shall not go into this matter fully, but I will read a table which I have carefully compiled, showing the aggregate production of the cereal crops in the United States from 1895 to 1904, inclusive, and the loss suffered by farmers on these crops, due to falling prices. In this table I have taken for the multiplier the difference between the average prices of the last ten years and of the ten years next preceding.

Aggregate production and the loss in last ten years by reason of falling prices.

|---|---|
| Corn, 21,203,238,849 bushels, at 3.38 cents, equals | $716,669,473 |
| Wheat, 5,779,303,095 bushels, at 3.92 cents, equals | 226,509,480 |
| Oats, 7,980,109,282 bushels, at 3.48 cents, equals | 277,707,803 |
| Rye, 253,137,984 bushels, at 5.53 cents, equals | 11,798,530 |
| Barley, 928,050,043 bushels, at 10.55 cents, equals | 97,909,279 |
| Buckwheat, 135,719,338 bushels, at 3.91 cents, equals | 5,306,628 |
| Lost to farmers in ten years on six crops | 1,335,901,193 |

These figures show that in the short period of ten years—ten years under "beneficial" influences of the prosperity-breeding Dingley tariff rates—our farmers have actually been robbed, in the depreciated value of six products alone, of $1,335,901,193—enough money to pay one-half of the national debt, principal and interest, and leave $200,000,000 remaining.

Then, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the gentleman's assertion to the contrary, "the imperishable record," to quote him, proves that the dawn of the Republican party was the twilight of the farmer's hope and of those good old times when wealth was fairly distributed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Pestilences may come, panics may occur, and we may even pass through the valley of the shadow of national death and our beloved country be drenched with blood shed amid the unspeakable horrors of civil war, and yet the hardy sons of toil—the farmers—who produce the wealth, under fair conditions, can retain a reasonable proportion of the wealth they produce. But through the unfair means of a protective tariff they are ruthlessly pillaged and robbed by those who plead the statute as their warrant of authority.

I hurl the gauntlet back at the gentleman from Ohio and challenge him to show by statistics, if he can—not by mere assumption or assertion—a time in the last one hundred years when growth in wealth and material development was as rapid, or when wealth was as universally and equitably distributed as in those good old days under Democratic administration, when lawmakers were responsive to the will of the people and enacted laws for public good and for the upbuilding of this great Republic and not for the unholy and unrighteous purpose of robbing the masses, under the forms of law, in order that a favored few may amass colossal fortunes and be enabled to make generous contributions to some campaign fund.

Mr. Chairman, "the imperishable record that the American people prosper under high tariffs and suffer under low tariffs" has been impeached, set aside, and for naught held by the cold logic of facts which can not be warped or changed. That great tribunal of last resort—the American people—will ere long enter final decree that protective tariff was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity [applause on the Democratic side]; that it is a base, false pretense and confidence game, by means of which producers are wrongfully, fraudulently, and larcenously deprived of their earnings; that the man or men who shall hereafter resort to deceptive and delusive argument to induce American citizens to repose confidence in the Republican policy of protection shall be held and adjudged to be particeps criminis with the trusts, and shall be pilloried in public opinion and forever deprived of a seat in Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

To expect the American farmer to longer confide in the Republican party is to assume that intelligent men have become insane and that "judgment has fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason." That party was, tacitly at least, committed to revision, but it has again broken faith with the country. You have smothered the "Iowa idea" and deadened its echo in Massachusetts. You have become intoxicated upon the wine of recent political success, and in your maudlin condition you defy the people who trusted you.

Grave fear that the next House will be Democratic has found numerous expressions. The people are becoming aroused. They are chafing under tariff burdens and tariff discriminations. They begin to realize the enormity of the crime of oppressing eighty-odd million people for the special use and benefit of less than half of one million. They are turning their faces and their hearts to the grand, historic old Democratic party [applause on the Democratic side]; a party often defeated it is true, but never yet and never to be conquered or subdued [applause on the Democratic side]; a party that would gladly welcome defeat again and again rather than violate its time-honored traditions or relinquish its faith in those eternal principles of justice and equality upon which it is builded and to which its hopes are firmly anchored. We will go to the country with a platform demanding tariff revision in plain, positive, and emphatic words, confident of the result. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I sincerely hope my party will place on that platform as the Democratic nominee in the next national election that man with the dew of morn yet upon his brow, who stands alone, towering above his fellows, the one true ideal of American statesmanship, the workingman's best and most faithful friend, the bold and fearless champion of the right and the defiant and uncompromising foe to the wrong, that pure and incorruptible American whose name is a terror and a menace to wrongdoers, but a solace and inspiration to good citizens everywhere.

With such a platform and such a candidate victory is ours. A political cyclone will sweep the country. When the storm shall have spent its fury, instead of ruin and desolation in its track we will witness joy unconfined, contentment, happiness, and real prosperity. Then we will have absolute assurance of a "square deal" for all, the wage-earner as well as the capitalist, the farmer as well as the manufacturer, because the ship of state will be guided from the White House by the unerring judgment and unrivaled statesmanship of the yet peerless Nebraskan, William J. Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has very cleverly divided his periods into ten years each, so as to include the Wilson bill and the Dingley bill in the same decade, attempting to show us, to the discredit of the Dingley law, what was detracted from that decade by the Wilson law.

Now, I would like to call his attention, just for a few minutes, to the conditions that prevailed during a part of those ten years—that was the Coxey army period. I remember they told us in those days of a Missourian who was a member of the Coxey army and who arrived back home after the long and fruitless journey on his return from Washington City. He was not presentable at home. He went up to the old Missouri farm and stood in the brush out near the barn, and when his little brother came to him he said to him: "I wish you would go in and tell mother to send me out a blanket, so I can walk into the house. Tell mother I have a hat." [Laughter.] That was about all he had left. Those were the deplorable conditions, which I hope the gentleman has not forgotten.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell me the year in which that occurred?

Mr. LACEY. Well, it being Missouri history, I refer the gentleman to his able second [Mr. CLARK of Missouri].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was it contemporaneous with the march of the Coxey army to Washington?

Mr. LACEY. It was subsequent to that, because it was on his return.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far subsequent that the McKinley bill was no longer in operation?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, I know what the gentleman is coming at now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The McKinley bill was in operation when Coxey's army marched to Washington.

Mr. LACEY. That is one of the old standard arguments of my Democratic friend.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true, isn't it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Isn't it true?

Mr. LACEY. The McKinley law had not been repealed when the panic of 1903 came.

Mr. WEISSE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I will first answer the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. The gentleman will remember very well that the Democratic party won their victory in 1892 upon the platform declaration that a protective tariff was unconstitutional. They won that victory, carrying the Presidency and the House by a great majority. They did not yet have the Senate. It was not until about February 20, 1893, when Mr. Roach, of Dakota, was elected to the Senate, that the gentleman's party secured a majority in both branches of Congress; both branches and the Presidency pledged to the repeal of protection and upon the declaration that all protection was unconstitutional. Then came on the panic and it was not until then, and it did not wait for the passage of the Wilson law. The repeal of the protective tariff was assured, and production suspended, waiting to know the worst.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to talk this afternoon on the subject of the home market. It was a pleasure to me a moment ago to see the Speaker go by clad in clothing made in North Carolina, the State that gave him birth. It recalled the days of Henry Clay, the great exponent of the American protective system, who came from Kentucky with Kentucky garments upon him and prided himself on wearing them upon the floors of the Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the days of Henry Clay nearly all Congressmen wore homespun, didn't they?

Mr. LACEY. They did not pride themselves upon it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why didn't they?

Mr. LACEY. Because they did not have the American spirit Henry Clay had.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Was Henry Clay the only man in the United States at that time that had the American spirit?

Mr. LACEY. No; Andrew Jackson declared in favor of protection to American industries. He was almost as good a protectionist in his day as Henry Clay.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but the gentleman undertakes to make the remark on the floor of the House that Henry Clay was a great natural curiosity because he wore homespun clothing, when everybody wore it.

Mr. LACEY. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who addresses me now has American clothing on. He also stands in American shoes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly I have, and any man who has any sense will buy an American suit if he can get the same quality cheaper than he can a foreign suit.

Mr. LACEY. I see that my friend has learned something. It is not so long ago that he was trying to tear down the custom-houses.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, that is the seven hundred and twenty-fifth time that that ridiculous statement has been repeated on the floor of this House. [Laughter.] And I had concluded at last that there was one Republican who had self-respect enough not to repeat a statement that every idiotic Republican in the House has repeated.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been congratulated, as I understand him now, 725 times on his conversion. I regret to have added the seven hundred and twenty-sixth time, but at the same time I rejoice to see him clothed and in his right mind—and clothed in American garments, too.

Mr. WEISSE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Not at present. I will yield after a while.

Mr. Chairman, it is the tendency of the human mind to look back with longing regret to the past which is gone and forward with hope to a golden future.

It is the present that is always complained of. Its good is minimized and its evil is magnified. There is nothing so disappointing as attainment. We think the least of that which we possess. The bird in the hand is never so attractive as the one in the bush, though it is a homely maxim that it is worth more. It is the experience of all sportsmen that the imagination dwells longingly upon the big fish that got away. The one brought home is likely to be looked upon with more or less scorn by the fisherman's wife. This mental peculiarity should be resisted.

THE HOME MARKET.

The "markets of the world" are always held up as the most attractive of all to the imagination. The importance of a great and increasing home market is likely to be underestimated. The philosopher in Æsop's Fables walked along, looking up at the stars, and fell in an open well at his feet.

Eighty-seven per cent of the products of our farms under existing conditions find a market, and a good one, the best in the world, in the United States.

In the last year we exported farm products to the amount of $859,160,264. The average export of farm products from 1890 to 1893, inclusive, was $677,896,870.

THE GERMAN TARIFF.

Germany takes pride in sending the products of her factories to all parts of the world, bearing the familiar legend "Made in Germany."

We admire her for her enterprise, but we are not willing to have our American tariff laws also labeled "Made in Germany."

The farmers of Iowa will view with considerable distrust any proposition to discriminate against our best customer, Great Britain. For the year 1904 our exports to the United Kingdom exceeded our entire exports to all the following countries put together: Germany, France, Holland, Italy, Belgium, Canada, Spain, Cuba, European Russia, Denmark, and Japan.

We all desire to maintain relations of the most friendly character with Germany. Vast numbers of her best citizens have crossed the ocean and cast their lot with us, a most welcome and useful addition to our population. Our friendship with Germany has been traditional.

Under the peculiar form of Government of the German Empire the landowners have power in Parliament largely in excess of their numbers, as the representation is not distributed in proportion to the population.

A tariff law was framed in Germany hostile to the interests of American farmers, and it was proposed that this law should take effect on the 1st of March, 1906.

Our exports to Germany in 1904 were $214,780,992. Our German imports were $118,138,089. Our imports were largely of manufactured goods upon which the Germans added the value of their labor. On the other hand, our exports to Germany were mainly of raw material which she desired to use in her manufactures, and included $87,392,063 of raw cotton. The raw materials exceeded $120,000,000 in value.

When we compare this with our enormous exports to Great Britain, which in 1904 amounted to $537,340,599, it is quite obvious that we could not afford to make any treaty with Germany giving her products a preference over those of Great Britain.

Some enthusiastic supporters of the proposition to give special concessions to Germany over those allowed to the balance of our European customers have asserted that we might increase our market for meats in Germany by such concessions to an amount equal to from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 per annum. These figures are evidently the product of enthusiasm rather than of investigation.

Our Bureau of Statistics reports from official sources that after excepting lard the entire meat products imported by Germany in the last five years has averaged about $12,000,000 yearly from all the outside world.

Imports of meat and meat products into Germany during the calendar years 1900 to 1905.

[From official German report.]

| Year. | Weight (pounds). | Value. |
|---|---|---|
| 1900 | 114,817,600 | $13,581,200 |
| 1901 | 120,204,500 | 15,008,800 |
| 1902 | 125,356,400 | 15,195,300 |
| 1903 | 76,450,500 | 9,261,100 |
| 1904 | 65,795,000 | 8,304,500 |
| 1905 | 122,400,100 | (a) |

[a] Values not yet computed for 1905.

Even if we should have made a treaty giving us all of this trade, it would have fallen a long way short of the proposed $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 per annum.

Last year we exported meats to the total amount of $182,552,149. The German trade is desirable, but we could not afford to foster it at the expense of injustice to our other European customers.

"PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST TO THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

We always have with us the idealist who spurns present good and wants to try something else. He always wants to keep moving on. He would not stand pat in a clover field. [Laughter.]

I wish to call the attention of the farmer, the miner, and the manufacturer to the value of our own market and the impropriety of trading it off or destroying it in the hope of other markets abroad. A country's prosperity depends on its ability to consume its products rather than upon its ability to export them.

I am from a great agricultural State and we feel the greatest interest in Iowa in the market for our farm products. Secretary Wilson in his recent report gives a series of figures upon the increase and value in production of the American farms that are so stupendous as to startle the imagination. His estimates show that in the year just closed the output of the farms of this country were worth $6,500,000,000, and, although we may complain of winds and rain, of heat and cold, Iowa is the most favored of all the States. Look to the north, and the best part of Minnesota lies next to her. The best of Wisconsin is its southwesterly portion. Illinois is a greatly favored State, but her richest land joins Iowa. North Missouri, which my friend [Mr. CLARK] represents, is the best part of her neighbor on the south. Northeastern Kansas reaches up toward Iowa and is the best part of the Sunflower State. Eastern Nebraska is the best of that State, and the southeastern part of Dakota is the fairest and most fertile of all the lands of that growing and prosperous State.

HOW PRICES ARE GOVERNED.

Iowa is bounded on all sides by a zone of fertility. The market to consume this vast product must be a great one. It is a common statement that the prices of all of our farm products are fixed in the markets of Europe; that the farmer is therefore concerned in the foreign rather than the domestic market. This statement is a fascinating one and has done great service in behalf of the free traders in many a campaign in the past.

It was especially effective in the South, where the soil had been scourged by slaves and no manufacturing enterprises had supplied a home market for any of their products. Now that in all parts of the South much of their cotton is manufactured in their own mills, the people there have come to realize that the price of their products sold abroad depends upon the amount of their surplus, and the more that is consumed at home the smaller the surplus, and the smaller the surplus the better is the foreign price.

This simple factor in the problem of prices and markets is now becoming well understood among the planters and farmers North and South. The foreign market is of value to our farm producers in taking that part of their output which can not be disposed of at home.

In old Virginia in the early colonial days they had a currency of tobacco. They had "money to burn." [Laughter.]

Under a Republican tariff law they are enjoying through all the South a prosperity unequaled in the country's history and have more money than ever before. [Applause.]

MOST VALUABLE CONSUMERS.

We are daily furnished with evidence of the superior value not only of a home market, but of the greater value of that market when the consumer is brought nearer to the producer.

The manufacturing consumer in the West is of more value to the farmer of his vicinity than a like number of consumers on the seacoast.

The home market is the best, and the nearer home the better. The free traders time and again in many years have taken the American workingman up into a high mountain and have offered him the "markets of the world" if he would only give up his own—the great home market. The offer has at times misled the voters of the Republic and always with the same disastrous results.

Napoleon said that "the political economists are mere visionaries, who judge men from books and the world from the map." Their theories look beautiful, but we have had too many and too recent experiences in this line to be misled again. Old Gorgon Graham tells us of the bull pup which was anxious to know what were the contents of the third rail on an interurban line. Having put his nose to the rail he was full of information on the subject in a moment. [Laughter.] In 1892 the people of this country were induced to experiment with a Democratic tariff bill and for several years they had more information on the tariff than they wanted. They had some to spare for the next generation.

Coxey's army wore out many shoes, but they replenished their wardrobe secondhand from the wayside, and did not furnish a very attractive market for the Massachusetts shoe manufacturers. Industry lay dead at home and the markets were overstocked abroad.

A "WALK IN LIFE."

The workingman's business in 1894 could not be classed as a trade. It was a "walk in life"—in search of work. [Laughter.] I allude to those dark days of "tariff reform" only lest we forget.

There is an old notion prevalent in New England that whatever is disagreeable is probably right. This is a feeling that should be combated. Hard times are disagreeable, but we should not import them.

I want to-day to recite for your consideration a few cold facts as to the business of the farm, the factory, and the mine. Let us, for example, take up a single industry in the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts. We have had some speeches from her delegation favoring the surrender of some of the farmer's protection for the benefit of the manufacturer. One of the principal industries is that of making shoes. Under the census of 1890 and 1900 the following figures appear:

FACTS AS TO BOOTS AND SHOES IN MASSACHUSETTS.

|---|---|
| 1890— | |
| Capital | $37,577,630 |
| Cost of materials | 63,928,182 |
| Value of products | 116,387,900 |
| 1900— | |
| Capital | 44,567,702 |
| Cost of materials | 75,751,964 |
| Value of products | 117,115,243 |

Under the calumniated Dingley law let us look at the showing:

|---|---|
| 1904— | |
| Capital | $52,504,892 |
| Cost of materials | 93,865,898 |
| Value of products | 154,598,570 |

And this great increase of products is accompanied by a gratifying increase in exports of boots and shoes:

|---|---|
| Exports in 1897 | $1,708,224 |
| Exports in 1905 | 8,057,697 |

Large as the increase of exports is, the magnitude of the home market to the boot and shoe producers is evidenced by the vast amount that is disposed of each year in the United States.

THE FACTORY'S BEST CUSTOMER.

Massachusetts should not be jealous of the prosperity of the great Northwest. The West rejoices in the advancement of the New England States, and a prosperous farmer is the best customer of the New England factory.

The contrast between the conditions of this great industry under the Democratic tariff law and under the Dingley law shows that the prosperity of the country must be regarded as a whole. A tariff prepared to build up a few special industries can not produce the proposed result. It must be drawn so as to give prosperity also to the other industries of the country.

The repeal of the tariff law may enable the farmers to buy some manufactured goods abroad cheaper than the present prices. But if this change puts out of employment the consumers of the farmers' own products the cheapness is too dearly bought.

Massachusetts' best market is the great West. Of her boot and shoe products she sold last year $8,000,000 abroad and $146,000,000 at home. I refer to this industry because some of her great operators complain of the small duty on hides which are the product of the Iowa farm.

In the West complaint is made that the protection to the manufacturer works a hardship upon the farmer whose products must look to Liverpool for their standard.

PROTECTION AND EXPORTS.

I wish to give some figures showing how protection to the home market has not prevented the farmer from selling heavily abroad. From 1890 to 1893, inclusive, the exports of our farm products averaged $677,896,870 per annum. From 1894 to 1898 they averaged $663,638,402. From 1899 to 1904 the average was $864,930,137. When we were seeking the world's markets under the Wilson tariff we sold $200,000,000 less of farm products abroad than we have under our expanded home market under the Dingley law.

And how is it with our general foreign trade? In 1894 we imported $654,994,622 of foreign products. Last year we imported $1,117,512,629, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. Our total exports in 1894 were $892,140,572. For the year 1904 they were nearly doubled, $1,518,561,720. Under the existing tariff our exports were the largest in our history, and so, too, were our imports.

Let us turn a moment to the South. The Manufacturers' Record of Baltimore has compiled some excellent statistics as to progress there.

PROGRESS IN THE SOUTH.

A Republican tariff protects Massachusetts and Iowa both. They are mutually interdependent. But the South, which fought our policies, has shared in their benefits. The South demanded free silver to increase the circulating medium and finds that the Republican gold standard has made good its promise. The circulation in 1896 was $1,539,169,634, and it is now $2,604,902,301, an increase from $21.48 per capita in 1896 to $31.40 per capita in 1905, and a few days ago had increased to $31.73.

By removing the doubt as to our standard of value confidence was assured and the circulation of the best money in the world has steadily increased.

But to return to the results in the South. The wealth of the 14 Southern States exceeds that of the whole counry in 1860. The assessed valuation of those 14 States in 1905 was $6,648,000,000, which is about one-third of the actual value. The actual value is nearly $20,000,000,000.

Farm lands in these 14 States have increased $245,000,000 a year, while from 1890 to 1900 the increase was $75,000,000 a year. The agricultural product of those Southern States for 1905 was $1,800,000,000. This takes no account of the great manufactures and mines in the South.

The mining industries of the nation are also in a prosperous condition. Mineral production for 1894, total value, $527,097,279, including coal; coal, tons, 186,903,315; value, $197,799,043. In 1904, total value, $1,289,047,146, including coal; coal, tons, 352,000,000; value, $444,816,288. For 1905 the total production will reach $1,500,000,000.

BETTER CONDITIONS THAN EVER BEFORE.

The manufacturer is prosperous. The miner is well employed. The farmer of the North and the planter of the South are enjoying better conditions than at any time in their history. Conditions certainly conduce to a cheerful optimism. In Iowa farm land has increased in value under the Dingley law 100 per cent. And the output of the Iowa factories for 1905 was $160,572,313, as shown by the recent census bulletin. Iowa's mineral production last year was $15,008,596.

A pessimist has been well defined as a "man who, when it comes to a choice between two evils, takes both of them." [Laughter.] The tariff reformers tried to prove an alibi in 1894, but the people found them guilty and returned the party of protection once more to power.

In 1892 enough of the workmen in the protected industries voted to abandon protection to elect Mr. Cleveland, while the farmers of the great Northwest remained true to the policy which has built up and preserved the great home market.

An arrangement by which Massachusetts can buy the bulk of her food products from Canada in consideration of freer markets there for American manufactured goods is an attractive programme from a purely sectional standpoint. But if the New England manufacturers' market in the agricultural regions of the Northwest is to be protected, the farmer should not be denied like benefits.

AS TO FREE HIDES.

A crusade in favor of the removal of the duty on hides has been organized in New England. In making a campaign along this line the mistake has been made of claiming that the hide of the beef is a mere "by-product," that the raiser of a steer sells his animal and "throws in" the skin. It is an old adage among the farmers that "there are five quarters to a steer—two forequarters, two hindquarters, and the hide and tallow make the fifth."

The hide as surely enters into the value of the whole animal as does the porterhouse steak. It is said that the hides are generally sold by the packer and that the farmer has no interest in their value; but the hide is the finished product of the farm and every time a farmer sells a steer he sells a hide.

It takes three years to produce and market a steer. It is a process that can not be forced. The producer must be patient. How many minutes does it take to make a pair of shoes by modern methods? The industry is protected and the shoes are the finished product. The farmer's summer toil and winter exposure is rewarded at the end of three years by a price for his stock that he often deems inadequate. That price includes all the elements of value in the animal. You can not fairly class such products as mere raw material. Capital, intelligence, skill, and labor are combined in the production of the finished animal products.

The Iowa farmer has stood and still stands by the protective system, and he has the right to share in its benefits. Any changes in schedules must recognize the interests of every part of the United States.

THE PARTY OF PROTECTION.

Parties do not make issues. Issues create parties.

Originally founded to restrict the spread of human slavery and afterwards to abolish it, the Republican party's work was not ended when, with a saved Union, the land was all free. It has continued in power as a vital force in the nation's growth.

The upholding of the national faith and credit, the maintenance of a sound currency, and the protection and upbuilding of American industries continue as its cardinal principles of faith; and to it and to its policies the farmer, the miner, the manufacturer, and the business man continue to look with confidence for good government and continued prosperity. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. WEISSE. The gentleman spoke about the 15 per cent duty on hides adding to the value of the cattle, that it adds to one part of the cattle—the hide. Now, I wonder what quarter the packers get when they are buying canner cows for $10 apiece and selling the hides for $10 apiece, and what part do the farmers get?

Mr. LACEY. I should say on the figures he gives the hide is about a half instead of a quarter. But I will ask my friend what State he hails from?

Mr. WEISSE. Wisconsin, and a tanner by trade.

Mr. LACEY. Then he wants free hides?

Mr. WEISSE. He wants to put the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] right.

Mr. LACEY. Does the duty add to the price of hides?

Mr. WEISSE. It does.

Mr. LACEY. I am obliged to the gentleman. Our friends from New England tell us it does not, so far as the farmer is concerned.

Mr. WEISSE. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], if he will answer me fairly, does he not believe that the 600,000 native steers exported, with their hides, and which are sold in this country for less money because of the 15 per cent duty on those hides—that they will get 15 per cent less on those steers' hides than they do here?

Mr. LACEY. My friend, who is a tanner—and Shakespeare says that a tanner will last nine years after he is dead—my friend as a tanner says the duty adds to the price of the hide, and yet that the cattle sell for less money with the hide on them.

Mr. WEISSE. The cattle exported to foreign countries.

Mr. LACEY. You may make a tanner believe that. You may make some of the gentlemen engaged in the manufacturing of boots and shoes in New England believe that, but you can not make the farmers of Wisconsin and Iowa believe it.

Mr. WEISSE. That may be, but the farmers of Wisconsin and Iowa consider the hide the product of that animal—an animal that is sold to foreign countries, and the foreign countries have to reimport that hide and sell it to this country. And I want to know if that hide does not sell for less in foreign countries. It makes a difference in the sale of hides, if they are taken off here or if taken off in England, of $1,000,000 to the farmers of this country. That is what it makes. And if the duty on hides is put there for the benefit of the farmer, then why do you not include calfskin and horsehide and the light hides which the farmers take off, of 85 per cent?

Mr. POWERS. I listened with great pleasure to the gentleman's speech, and I noticed that he stated repeatedly "Our friends from New England" claim that the duties should be taken off of hides. I notice he used "Massachusetts" occasionally and "New England" as convertible terms.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask my friend from Maine if Massachusetts is not all New England?

Mr. POWERS. Not at all. I wish to say to my friend here that there is some little portion of New England outside of Massachusetts.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask my friend from Maine if it is not true that Maine used to be a part of Massachusetts?

Mr. POWERS. It was, only eighty-five years ago. What I am coming at is this——

Mr. LACEY. Then you have got over it there.

Mr. POWERS. I wish to enter this protest: There is, as I was about to say, a small portion of New England—one-half of its territory—called the State of Maine. Now in Maine we are not sitting up at nights with the desire of having the duty taken off of hides. We raise them. We are utterly opposed to taking the duty off of any products of the farmer, and we are utterly opposed to the Massachusetts idea of reciprocity with Canada so that the products will come in. [Applause.] And we do not want to be included as that part of New England that is desirous of breaking down the tariff law and introducing foreign products.

Mr. LACEY. I am very fond of Massachusetts. I am only a little more fond of Maine than of Massachusetts. I never did like to see Massachusetts go astray, and when I find a State represented as ably as she is on the floor of this House saying that they want to take off the protection on Iowa products, or a portion of them, in the interest of their factories—factories which are prosperous and successful beyond almost any time in their history—I simply want to sound a note of warning to them; and when I use the terms "New England" and "Massachusetts" as convertible terms, it is a matter of force of habit, because out West we have always given Massachusetts great prominence.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. LACEY. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not Albert B. Cummins now serving a second term as governor of Iowa, and running for a third term?

Mr. LACEY. And I understand the gentleman is very much in favor of him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am asking you the question.

Mr. LACEY. He is running for the third term.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He is a Republican?

Mr. LACEY. He was elected as a Republican, and believes in a great many Republican things.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did you ever read of a sentence out of one of his speeches delivered this winter, in which he declared that "all the robberies and thefts committed by all the insurance officers since life insurance was first originated do not amount to as much extortion as the Dingley bill for one year?"

Mr. LACEY. I have read it with the same pain that I did my friend's speech about the custom-houses. It is the same kind of a speech, and he also will deny it 725 times before he is through with it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But I have never denied it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. But you have regretted it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I never regretted it. [Renewed laughter.] If I do regret anything it is that a man on the floor of the House, making a set speech that is already printed, when asked a fair question, would not answer the question instead of making a fling about a speech made here seven years ago.

Mr. LACEY. What is the statute of limitations in Missouri?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Three years.

Mr. LACEY. Well, then the gentleman pleads the statute of limitations?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I do not plead the statute of limitations. [Laughter and applause.] I want you to answer my question.

Mr. LACEY. The doctors tell us that a man entirely changes—that there is not even a part of a bone left—in seven years. The gentleman who made that speech [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] does not stand before me. He is in no wise the same man. The man whom we all love and respect is entirely changed, not only physically, but mentally in the seven years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Answer me categorically, yes or no: Is Albert B. Cummins, the governor of Iowa, a Republican? Now answer it. You know it.

Mr. LACEY. Will you answer it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you will not answer it, I will; but I want you to answer it.

Mr. LACEY. I am not his keeper.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, he is a candidate for governor for the third term, is he not; and the leading candidate, is he not?

Mr. LACEY. He is seeking the nomination. There are others.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You voted for him twice?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And if he is nominated again you will vote for him?

Mr. LACEY. I suppose I will vote for him if he is nominated on our ticket. [Laughter.] If he is on your ticket I will not. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He is not on our ticket yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WEISSE. No doubt I took an undue advantage of the gentleman in asking him a question about hides, but he, being a farmer, I will ask him in regard to the price of potatoes. Probably he knows that last year potatoes sold for a pretty fair price and this year also. If under the Dingley tariff bill the 25 cents a bushel added to the price of the potatoes 25 cents, can he tell me how it was that the farmers of Wisconsin had to take them and haul them for miles and sell them for 4 cents a bushel?

Mr. LACEY. Well, now, the gentleman asks a very unwise question. I would ask the gentleman if his idea would be, in order to protect the farmers of Wisconsin growing potatoes—would he take away the duty between Wisconsin and Canada? Would he do that?

Mr. WEISSE. I did not mean the price of foreign products.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman certainly has not paid very close attention to my speech. I called attention to the fact that you must consider the various different conditions to get the complete results. You can not take a single isolated instance of an excessive growth of potatoes and early frost to condemn the tariff, but you should take the products of every kind that are protected by the tariff and adjust it to the general conditions over this vast area of country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Results and concomitants.

Mr. LACEY. Including Mississippi, which is prosperous, I am glad to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Prosperity existing by reason of the Dingley bill?

Mr. LACEY. Existing by the fact that it is a partner in a country that is enjoying the benefits of protection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under an extensive free-trade mantle.

Mr. LACEY. What kind of a free-trade mantle?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Free trade between the States.

Mr. LACEY. Oh, between the States. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side.] Now, I will ask my friend from Mississippi, would he adopt the same rule between Mississippi and Liverpool as he does between Mississippi and Kentucky?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely, except for the necessity of a revenue.

Mr. LACEY. Very well, then; my friend, too, would burn down the custom-houses, if he could.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I could not, because I would have to collect revenues, and the gentleman from Iowa has brains enough to know that.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman would limit it to a revenue tariff?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely.

Mr. LACEY. Then I am glad to see that here is one man who after seven years, although the body has changed, has the same mind. He was a free trader seven years ago and he is a free trader yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He was not a free trader seven years ago and is not a free trader now. He is a tariff-for-revenue man.

Mr. LACEY. That is the same thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And anybody with ordinary sense knows the difference between the two.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, indeed. I have not the floor, however.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Mississippi believes in free hides?

Mr. WILLIAMS. "The gentleman from Mississippi" believes in a tariff for revenue, and he believes in collecting that revenue as nearly as possible upon all imports into the United States, distributing the tax in accordance with two things—the necessities of the Government for revenue, upon the one hand, and the nature of the product, whether it is a necessity or a luxury, upon the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, am I correct in supposing that the gentleman from Mississippi has introduced a somewhat extensive bill which relates to the repeal and alteration of certain sections in the Dingley tariff, and that in that bill which he has introduced there is a provision for a duty on hides and a duty on sole leather as well?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, and in accordance absolutely with the theory of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WEISSE. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa one more question.

Mr. LACEY. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I will say further in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is a duty of 5 per cent instead of a duty of 15 per cent.

Mr. WEISSE. The gentleman from Iowa contends that the Dingley bill increases the price of the article to an extent. Now, I want to ask him a fair question. In 1890 hides sold for about 4¼ cents. In Chicago last fall they sold at 13¾, and also sold at that price all over the world—a little less here than in foreign countries. It was at a point where we exported when we reached the highest point. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if the 15 per cent duty on 4-cent hides raised the price to 15¾ cents? That is easy to answer.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; that is dead easy. It is a mere matter of computation. But I should like to ask my friend how much the tanners' trust had to do with raising the price last year?

Mr. WEISSE. The tanners' trust of the United States represents less than 20 per cent of the tanning industry of this country.

Mr. LACEY. I am glad to get that information from the gentleman. Coming from the Democratic side of the House, I hope nobody will controvert it hereafter in the progress of this debate.

Mr. WEISSE. All right. I will state further that in 1880 there were 5,700 tanneries in this country, and to-day, under this high protective system, there are 1,300, and if you will continue it there will be a lot more of them go over into Canada in order to get the benefit of the free hides. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. LACEY. I do.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WEISSE] who has just taken his seat, when he makes that statement that only 20 per cent of the tanners of the United States are in the so-called "trust," does he not know and should he not explain to this House that far more than 20 per cent of the tanners of sole leather are included in the trust?

Mr. WEISSE. Does the gentleman maintain that the American Hide and Leather Company, the Shaws in Wisconsin, the Pennsylvania Leather Company do not tan hides? I will state to him that the United States Leather Company tan probably about 40 per cent of the sole leather that is tanned in this country, 60 per cent being tanned by independent companies which I can not mention at the present time, but if he will give me time I will bring the information in a few days. I want to say further that the American Hide and Leather Company tan hides that you pay duty on, and all harness leather, all upper leather, all strap leather, and in fact every piece of leather that the farmer wears is cut out of a hide that pays duty, and only when he wears the soles of his Sunday shoes and his kid gloves does he get anything that comes in free of duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question in my time. Does the gentleman say that a considerable part of the tanneries have left the United States and gone to Canada on account of free hides?

Mr. WEISSE. So it has been reported.

Mr. LACEY. I want the gentleman to state whether it is a fact or not; not whether it is so reported.

Mr. WEISSE. I believe there is no doubt about it. The tanning industry has been on the decline on account of the duty on hides.

Mr. LACEY. What do they do with the hides in Canada after they tan them?

Mr. WEISSE. They have to buy the hides first.

Mr. LACEY. But what do they do with them after they tan them?

Mr. WEISSE. They sell them there in Canada, I suppose.

Mr. LACEY. Do they ship them back to the United States?

Mr. WEISSE. Does the gentleman mean ship the leather back here?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. WEISSE. No; I do not think they do.

Mr. LACEY. I thought it was remarkable if they left the United States in order to dodge a 15 per cent duty on hides and would go over there and tan the hides and then ship the leather back and pay the duty under the Dingley law on the manufactured article.

Mr. WEISSE. The 15 per cent duty on hides increases the investment in a tannery to such an extent that if the tanner had the interest money on that investment it would be a greater profit than the American Hide and Leather Company and the United States Leather Company have made since they have been in existence.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, if the gentleman from Iowa will yield to me——

Mr. LACEY. I will yield such time as the gentleman desires in order to further carry on this civil-service examination. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether the Central Leather Company, which has bought up the United States Leather Company and other independent concerns, does not tan the greater part of the sole leather that goes into high-class shoes?

Mr. WEISSE. The Central Leather Company does not increase the tanning capacity of the United States Company in sole leather. It does reach out and combine a few harness leather tanneries, but it does not, except in one of them, produce an increase in the production of sole leather. Neither does it control the American Hide and Leather Company. It is independent of either one. It grew out of a deal whereby the Pennsylvania Leather Company was organized. They took a certain amount of money out of the United States Leather Company and compelled the dealers to reorganize. Armour took some stock in it, but has not a controlling interest in it at the present time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Am I to understand from the gentleman that in his opinion the Central Leather Company is not controlled by Armour and his brother-in-law Valentine?

Mr. WEISSE. Not controlled; they are stockholders.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Have they got a controlling interest?

Mr. WEISSE. Not at the present time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. One other question. I will confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am surprised at the information given by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin either include in the RECORD, if he has not the information available, or tell the House now what factories have been driven out of this country into Canada by operation of the present law, specifying them by name and giving the number of sides of sole leather they produce in the course of a year?

Mr. WEISSE. That is rather a broad question. No doubt some one in the trade would be able to give that information. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how many more shoes would there be made in this country and exported providing we did not give the foreign manufacturers 15 per cent rebate on the leather they bought here? In other words, it puts the foreigner in shape so that he can buy his leather in the American market 15 per cent less than the American manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And the gentleman, of course, understands that the reason of that rebate is because it is to our advantage and not to our disadvantage to have hides sent in here to be tanned and then reexported. It gives employment to our own people in our own factories.

Mr. WEISSE. That is right, and the people in the shoe factories in the State of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] are unemployed because the foreigner can buy his leather 15 per cent cheaper in the American market than the shoe manufacturer can, I would suggest to the gentleman, if he is looking for employment for his laborer.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Then I should like to repeat my request, that the gentleman incorporate in his remarks in the RECORD the list of those firms that have been driven out of the United States.

Mr. WEISSE. And I would like to have the gentleman incorporate in his remarks the number of shoe factories that could be operated in Massachusetts if the foreigner could not buy his leather 15 per cent cheaper than the American.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will endeavor in my own way to predict how many different shoe factories would be established, if that is what the gentleman desires.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I listened to the gentleman's speech, but during one portion of it I was engaged in conversation with another gentleman. Did the gentleman from Iowa state in his speech that the surplus of American products that sold abroad had nothing to do with the domestic article at home?

Mr. LACEY. I stated exactly the contrary, that when you reduce the surplus by consumption in the home markets then you have a less amount to send abroad to break the foreign market down with. Consequently the foreign market is affected by the surplus and the home market is also affected by the surplus. It is what we consume at home that adds mainly to the price. The price of our surplus abroad of course is fixed by the size of the surplus.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. And if you had to export three-fourths or four-fifths of your Missouri farm products to Liverpool, the price would go down, because you would "bear" that market by the volume of your products. On the other hand, if you have the St. Louis market and the big factories at home and home consumption the amount sent abroad is less, the scarcity abroad raises the price there so that the price abroad is fixed by the size of the surplus, and you want to reduce that surplus as much as possible, so far as you can do it by getting a good home market for the product.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We shipped last year, in round numbers, fifty-three millions of farm products to Germany—about that. What, in the judgment of the gentleman, would be the effect on the price of the American farm products to the farmers if that entire fifty-three millions were thrown back on the American market?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman has not got it near enough. There were eighty-seven millions of cotton products.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, I am talking about farm products as we understand that term up where you and I live—in Missouri and Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. But the gentleman's southern colleagues on that side would hardly agree with him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but no American tariff can affect the price of cotton anywhere on earth. Fifty-three millions of our sort of farm products were shipped to Germany. Suppose that was thrown back on the American market, what effect would that have on the price?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, it would undoubtedly have an injurious effect. There is no question about that; but the point I was seeking to make was this: Now, we ship an immensely larger quantity to England than we do to Germany, and the proposition of our German friends was that we should make a concession—a special concession—to them. If we do that, we must make the same concession to Great Britain. Consequently we would have to scale down our entire tariff, not only as against Germany, but as against Great Britain as well, or we will not be doing the fair thing by Great Britain, and if we do that and greatly enlarge the imports of foreign products, we have taken away that much of the market from our home factories; and when you do that, that takes employment away from the workingman in those factories and takes away from the American the home market. The home market is the best, because we control that. When we go skirmishing after the markets of the world we have to compete with all mankind. This American market, which is the best in the world, we have, and I say we will be foolish to give it up.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask one more question. Do you not think England is just as liable to take exception to this juggling with German invoices that has either been set on foot or is being set on foot as it would be to take exception to a change in the tariff law?

Mr. LACEY. If Germany has any advantage in the way of convenience under a new arrangement as to invoices, that same advantage will have to be given to England. It must be given in all fairness and all decency, and will be if she wants it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just as soon as England protests, then we have got to go through this administrative revision of the tariff again.

Mr. LACEY. Would my friend suggest a different method than giving to Great Britain whatever is given to Germany?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir; I will tell you——

Mr. LACEY. Then the gentleman and I agree upon one thing at least. To treat Great Britain worse than Germany would not be reciprocity.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would suggest this: That we should have a fair tariff law, inasmuch as we have to have one at all, and that it be fixed so that we can treat all nations of the earth alike and give them advantages where they give us advantages.

Mr. LACEY. Does the gentleman claim that we do not trade with the nations of the world?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not talking now about buying horses and cattle, or anything of that sort. I am talking about reciprocal relations with these nations.

Mr. LACEY. I was talking about results—that during last year we not only sold more abroad than ever in the history of our country, but we bought more abroad.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is only half the answer, and I will answer the other half, which you ought to have given in all fairness, and that is every nation on the face of the earth did identically the same thing—that is, sold more and bought more. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. And you remember the bread riots and the march which took place only a few months ago through the streets of London by the unemployed. Does the gentleman forget it has only been two or three months ago that the women of the suburbs of London marched down to the House of Parliament and demanded relief?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now I will ask you a question, and you can answer it "yes" or "no."

Mr. LACEY. Why, because they were not having employment there, so I do not presume they are having the same conditions in the Old World as here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that England sold us more last year and we sold England more?

Mr. LACEY. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why are you and your party associates not willing to adopt a tariff system by which we can enter into reciprocal relations with all the nations of the earth?

Mr. LACEY. We have adopted a tariff system which brings these results. We treat them all alike. My friend helped to make a tariff bill a few years ago which brought about exactly the opposite result.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is not true, because——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not intend to get into this controversy, and the gentleman from Iowa is taking care of himself, but I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact the recent upheaval in British politics came by the representation made by Chamberlain and Balfour that the industries of England had fallen at a rapid pace because of the falling off of their foreign markets, and if their struggle for a protective tariff was not based upon the proposition that they had been driven homeward and these hard times and starvation came by their lack of foreign markets?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, they were doing exactly what I have been doing to-day. They have been holding up the United States as an example for the world to profit by. And instead of holding us up as my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] does, as adopting policies that ought to be abandoned and ought to be shunned, Great Britain has been torn from one end to the other by envy at the progress and prosperity in this country under the policy under which we now live.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have permission to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. All right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if the very state of conditions he sets out about what Chamberlain said and what Chamberlain did, is not the identical reason why Chamberlain's party was defeated by a larger parliamentary majority than ever has been obtained in any parliamentary election in England since history began?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is wise enough to draw a distinction between the result of an election and the statement of facts undisputed, made during the progress of the great debate in England. And I say now in answer to it, that there was no pretense made that the statement of Balfour and Chamberlain was not true, that they had been driven out of the markets of the world, and that our products were driving their laboring men out of the labor markets to starvation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not the gentleman answer the question that I asked?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have answered it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My question was: If Chamberlain's contention about the tariff, which the gentleman just now stated, was not the reason of Chamberlain's party losing Parliament by five hundred and odd majority out of a membership of something over 700?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Chamberlain was seeking a remedy that the people did not approve of.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is exactly it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman deny the condition of British industry and of British trade to-day?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, the people seem to have set down upon Chamberlain and his authority.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The people have done nothing of the kind. And the statement which I have read is backed up by every writer and every statesman of England.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I want the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] to answer the question I asked him. [Laughter.] I like to hear him make a speech, but I want him to answer this question: If it is not true that the imports from England into this country last year were larger than they had been, and our exports to England were larger, too?

Mr. LACEY. It unquestionably is, and the gentleman's proposition is to therefore change the tariff law under which these results were accomplished. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK. No; it was not. My proposition is that if we give Germany or any other nation the privileges under an administrative revision of the tariff—and I say that Congress ought to revise it instead of the Administration—if we give Germany or any other nation under this administrative revision of the tariff privileges that such a nation as England does not get the advantage of, England or that other nation that is discriminated against is as liable to raise a row as Germany was.

Mr. LACEY. Not only liable to do it, but ought to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not settle it under the general law, then?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has expired.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, there are but a few things in the world at one and the same time more amusing and more pitiful than the acrobatic exploits of human intelligence when attempting to prove that protectionist laws, whose avowed purpose is to circumscribe and limit trade, result in increasing trade. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has just illustrated to what extent human ingenuity and human credulity—self-hypnotism, in a word—can go in connection with this sort of exercise. The gentleman from Iowa has just argued that the United States of America were never as prosperous as they are now, and has proven that assertion by saying that they bought more and sold more last year than they ever did before in their history. Then immediately after that he confesses that Great Britain bought more and sold more from us and to us than she ever did before in her history. In the next sentence he asserts that Great Britain is disastrously unprosperous.

Can the same thing prove two things and those two things opposite? The very thing that he cites as showing the prosperity of the United States is cited by him for the purpose of bolstering up his assertion that Great Britain is not prosperous, but is falling behind the industrial progress and opportunities of our people at this time.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that there are about 100,000 unemployed people of the city of London. London has a population of over 6,000,000 people, and it would be a very remarkable thing indeed if there could not be found 100,000 unemployed in a city with 6,000,000 people plus. I will undertake to say that the percentage of unemployed in the city of New York upon that very identical day was greater than it was in London. There happened to be then this condition: There was an approaching political election going on in London and a very large labor movement undertaking to thrust itself into politics, and this great procession was originated as a part of that, and to show the independence of these people and their manhood and their comparative prosperity they carried upon their banners the legend, "It is not charity nor largess that we want, but it is justice."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has referred to a bill which I introduced in this House. I want you to understand the character of that bill, and I want the gentleman from Massachusetts' constituents to know what it is, and I want them to know that it is pending in the Ways and Means Committee with a Republican majority of two to one, and at the proper time I am going to ask a vote upon it from the chairman of that committee [Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE], of the great State of New York. [Applause.] It is in absolute keeping with the Democratic doctrine of the Walker tariff, the greatest distinctive tariff that this country ever saw in all of its history.

The bill provides for a reduction of the duty on hides from 15 per cent to 5 per cent, a reduction of the duty on sole leather from 20-odd per cent—I have forgotten the figure—to 7 per cent, and a reduction of between 45 and 60 per cent of the balance of the leather and harness schedules from whatever it is now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts is here as a Representative of a Massachusetts district. He is supposed to represent the interest of the Massachusetts people wherever those interests are not wrong. Of course, no man is presumed to represent any interest when that interest is wrong or when there is anything immoral or unethical about the sought-to-be-represented interest. And this test, by the way, is much easier for a Democrat than it is for a Republican. No Democrat, no true Democrat, ever represents the interests of his constituency to the point of insisting upon pulling out of the Treasury of the United States special benefits for that constituency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] My leather-schedule bill does not propose to pull out of the Treasury special benefits collected by levying taxes upon the balance of the people of the United States for anybody's pocketbook interest, but is a proposition to reduce the taxes upon the balance of the people of the United States and thereby put money in the pockets of Mr. GARDNER's Massachusetts constituents; and we will see whether he will appear before the Ways and Means Committee and urge the passage of that bill or of some other bill along these lines, cheapening the raw material to the Massachusetts manufacturer, and at the same time cheapening, by another reduction of duty, boots and shoes and harness to the farmers, and dentists, and preachers, and laborers, and women and children of the country.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Undoubtedly I do, and with great pleasure.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman need not expect me to appear before the committee in support of a bill that provides a 5 per cent duty on hides.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. Chairman, we meet with the usual result in my friend's person of people who want to appear to do something while they do not do it, and while they really, perhaps—I do not know—do not too urgently desire to do it. Now, then, I will face the gentleman with another bill upon that subject later on, because I understand his objection to be now that if the duty is reduced the duty is not reduced sufficiently. Is that the gentleman's objection to the bill?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that I took refuge behind the impossible. May I ask the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman knows that free hides are absolutely impossible at this time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts (continuing). Whether he does not think that his bill is also absolutely impossible?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think my bill ought to be perfectly possible, but considering——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Free hides ought to be possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But considering the complacent, satisfied Republican majority, with its total ignorance of the condition of affairs in this country outside of the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Ways and Means, and their present temporary majority, I frankly confess that I do not think my bill will pass.

Mr. WEISSE. May I ask the gentleman a question in regard to the hide tariff? Why did they not put the light hides of 15 pounds and under 25 pounds under 20 per cent, when these are taken off and sold direct by the farmer?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. I am not, however, as competent to answer the question as he himself would be, but still I will give the answer as best I understand it. Under the pretext of putting what is called a "protection" for the farmer—I hate that word "protection," by the way; why don't you call it "protectionism" and be done with it? Protection is something that helps everybody, and your protectionism helps—hot houses—one fellow at the expense of all other fellows, so you just ought to call it "protectionism" and be done with it. But under your theory of protectionism the idea was to solace the farmer, that magnificent specimen of so-called intelligent American citizenship who inhabits the district of my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]—to fill his soul full with the idea that he was somehow benefited and "protected" by law. And then really the classes did not want him to get too much out of it, so they enacted a duty upon hides of 15 per cent; and then by a ruling of the custom-house people they declare that the word "hide" is to be construed as the trade construes it, and therefore it applies only to such outer bark taken off of a cow as weighs over 25 pounds, and most of the hides of cattle that the farmers skin on the farm, and out amongst my Texas friends over here, weigh less than 25 pounds, and are not so-calledly protected at all—not so-calledly even. Most of the heavy cattle go to the packers, and the packers pay pretty much whatever they please for the cattle on the hoof, and sell dressed beef at pretty much whatever they please, and the percentage that the hide adds to the price of the beef on the hoof is beyond even the ingenuity of my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] to cipher out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to go further with this: We are not, as Democrats, willing to concentrate the taxing power of this country upon a few articles. We are not willing to bribe New England to stay in the Republican party. Do you catch that? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. As long as New England continues to vote for an iniquitous and onerous system of taxation, benefiting a few at the expense of the many, as she has prospered in the past by the system—when she comes to us we will meet her in good Democratic spirit of brotherhood, and say we are always willing to do equity, but when she comes into a court of equity she must come with clean hands. We are therefore not willing to put hides upon the free list to enrich your boot and shoe manufacturers unless you, speaking for your boot and shoe manufacturers, will agree at the same time to reduce the duties upon the finished product, so that the women and children of the South and West may buy shoes cheaper. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. With pleasure.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. When the gentleman speaks of being unwilling to bribe the people of New England to stay in the Republican party—and I suppose he means the people of Massachusetts——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I also have made the usual mistake of regarding Massachusetts as New England. [Laughter.] I apologize for it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And without wishing to call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I apologize, however, to Massachusetts; not to the balance of New England.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Without reminding the gentleman that Massachusetts was set off from Maine some time ago, what I want to know is this: Do you mean to say that the Democratic party will not remove the duty entirely from the hide or outer bark of the cattle, or whatever you call it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean to say that the Democratic party will not do it unless at the same time it removes or reduces very materially the duty upon the products made out of hides; and I mean to say furthermore that the Democratic party is ready now to go as far as either Republicans or Democrats in Massachusetts desire to go, provided only that you come in and agree to do your part in reducing duties accruing to your pocketbook interests as manufacturers of boots and shoes and harness under that tariff law. In other words, we will not allow you to attack the iniquitous pocketbook interests of the Iowa farmer, who imagines that he sells these hides (he really does not do it; they go to the packer, and the packer sells the only ones that have got any duty upon them at all—my friend LACEY really has been thinking all this time, and his constituents who have been writing to him about these taxed hides weighing over 25 pounds, that his farmers got the duty)—we are not willing to have you attack the pocketbook interest or fancied pocketbook interest of my friend LACEY'S constituents by putting hides entirely upon the free list, iniquitous as we regard prostituting the laws of the country to any pocketbook interest, unless you will in your magnanimity—and Massachusetts from her historic position in this country ought to be capable of some degree of magnanimity—unless you in your magnanimity freely and voluntarily agree to give up some part of the pocketbook interest in the shape of duties on the finished products that you are indulging in at the expense of the general consumers of the United States.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, indeed.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Speaking solely for such part of Massachusetts as I represent, I think that I can safely say that we are willing to give up every particle of the duty on sole leather in return for free hides.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much will the gentleman give of the duty on the boots and shoes and harness? Let us have a little experience meeting here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A modus vivendi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, a modus vivendi, as my friend from Missouri says.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Harness, so far as I know, are not manufactured in my district, and I know nothing about the conditions of the trade. I will say this, however, that if a rule were introduced by the Committee on Rules, of which the gentleman from Mississippi is a member——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nominally, nominally. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Of which the gentleman from Mississippi is, at all events, nominally a member and sometimes invited to the meetings, I presume——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am invited to the séances, but never consulted about the spiritualistic appearances. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If a rule were introduced providing for the consideration of a bill for free hides and free sole leather, with a 10 per cent duty on shoes and 10 cents ad valorem——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman means 10 cents specific duty?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Ten per cent ad valorem and 10 cents a pair in lieu of the present 25 per cent duty, I should advocate it most heartily.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am inclined to think that if you would reduce the duty a little bit more on boots and shoes, I would join with you in the modus vivendi, and we would make a column charge on the gentleman from New York, on the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am also nominally a member, and I think we could arrive at a result. Your 10 per cent plus 10 cents specific, as a new basis, is hardly a reduction.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Do I understand my friend to say that it could be done?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Something like it could be done, provided you could persuade the Republican Speaker of the House, and the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Ways and Means, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]—all Republican leaders—and the gentleman from Massachusetts knows what an easy job that is. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Then the gentleman doesn't think it a practical question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a practical question if you Republicans who say you are in favor of it are in earnest and would coerce your leaders.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If the gentleman says it could be done, may I be excused for asking him if he believes in Santa Claus? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do, in a way. I believe in it just as I believe in the New England fetich that the Republican party will revise the tariff. [Applause and laughter.] I think that Santa Claus is a very useful cult among children to encourage faith, and I believe the Massachusetts Republican reliance in the junior Senator from Massachusetts and in yourself and in the entire Republican Congressional representation to revise the tariff is an awfully useful cult to encourage Republican voters, who seem to be as full of credulity as children are at Christmas, to remain "in line." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEISSE. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. WEISSE. I would like to state to the gentleman the information in regard to the duty on leather from the tanners' standpoint, that whenever they took the duty off from leather they should leave the raw material free for tanners' use.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That great Democrat, Governor Douglas, from the State of Massachusetts, came down with the intention of having a social conference with the President of the United States, but was deprived of that happiness by the fear of the President that he might afterwards repeat something said in the White House—so secret are those inner arcana conferences at the Executive Mansion—I understand, announced for both himself and his committee he would rather put boots and shoes on the free list than to continue to pay 15 per cent duty on hides.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is true; but Governor Douglas makes a grade of shoes that perhaps does not need a duty. At least 35 per cent of the manufacturers in my district could not afford to make the exchange. The type of shoe which this minority makes is subject to foreign competition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In answer to that I have to say that if there are 35 per cent of the boot and shoe manufacturers in the gentleman's district who can not make that sort of boots and shoes, and if Mr. Douglas can make them, in order that the people can get their shoes much cheaper, as they would if the duty were taken off, I suggest that Governor Douglas make all the shoes and the other 35 per cent of the manufacturers get at something else. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is a good idea, and I suggest that the gentleman explain if all the people in his district can afford to pay $3.50 a pair for shoes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Speaking for myself, I have been able to buy two or three pairs recently, but then I am not particularly choice about my boots and shoes——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is there no necessity for cheap shoes in the gentleman's district?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, absolutely. Cheap shoes are the very shoes that would be benefited by reducing the duty on hides, and least of all shoes need protection.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I have heard that statement made again and again on this floor. It is not so. There are certain kinds of shoes, like the farmers' peg shoes——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; "brogans" we call them.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I call them "farmers' peg shoes," and I think I am quite as correct, if not more so. The bottoms are made of sole leather and the uppers are made of splits. Now, that kind of shoe is perhaps more affected by this duty on hides than any other kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. But, other than heavy wear, the ordinary cheap shoe is not affected nearly so much as the high-priced shoe.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I do not care much about my own speech. I would just as soon listen to one made by anybody else, especially by my friend from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; I did not mean that, but I meant to say that I would proceed now to answer that part of the gentleman's remarks before he made another remark.

I may be mistaken, but it is my judgment, at any rate, that the commoner the shoe the more leather it has got in it and the less workmanship in proportion, and, of course, in proportion as it has less workmanship just exactly in that proportion does the difference between the American and the foreign standard of wages work in favor of the manufacturer of the coarse shoe and against the manufacturer of the highly finished shoe; and just in proportion as it has more leather in it, just exactly in that proportion will the cheapness of the raw material—the hide—help the man who is turning out the cheap shoe. I don't think there can be any amount of statistics in the world that could convince me that that statement is not true.

I want to talk now to my old friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. I came into the Fifty-third Congress, and I have looked into that countenance so often for light and so often had to look elsewhere and get the light in other places [laughter] that it is not a very encouraging thing for me to seek it at this time. Sometimes I look into the Republican countenance and feel a certain degree of anxiety for fear I may stir up a spirit of combativeness that will down me, but that sort of a feeling never comes over my mind when I am speaking to the gentleman from Iowa. It has been said of the family of Bourbons, who controlled Spain, and France, and Naples, and partly Portugal——

Mr. LACEY. And Mississippi. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Mississippi—they did, and I am astonished at the accuracy of the gentleman's geographical information, because southern Mississippi did once belong to France and was controlled by the Bourbons, but since we ousted them the race of Bourbons have fled. Now, it was said of those people that their marked peculiarity was that "they learned nothing and forgot nothing." If that be a correct definition of a Bourbon, I do not know a man upon this floor who better deserves to be admitted into the royal family than does my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

To my certain knowledge he has been repeating some of these things he said this morning ever since the Fifty-second Congress, when I came up as a kid to watch the performance of that body before I was admitted into the Fifty-third, to which I had been elected, and it seems to me that that far back the gentleman was ringing the changes upon the assertion that we never had any panics except under Democratic tariff laws—ringing the changes regardless of all history, regardless of all facts. Certainly after that in the Fifty-third Congress, I believe it was, that ever-memorable genius—the ablest running debater the American people ever saw, Thomas B. Reed, of Maine—standing upon that side of the Chamber one day was asked the question as to why it was that under the McKinley bill we were then and there suffering from a panic as we then and there were, and in a jocular vein replied, because it was "in anticipation of changing the McKinley law." Now, that has been poll-parroted around by my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] and other people ever since, and with true Bourbon characteristics, no matter what you tell him, no matter what dates tell him—and chronology is about the only thing in the world that can not be disputed—in spite of all that dates tell him and everything else, he will keep on poll-parroting, and he is going to keep on until he dies. Why, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] even has quit that—grown ashamed of it—and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has quit that. The other day the latter gentleman called me to order upon the floor for asserting that he had asserted that the Wilson-Gorman bill had anything to do with the panic of 1893, and yet my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] repeats it here to-day. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] asked me if I believed in Santa Claus. Of course I do. There he is right now in propria persona—the dear old tradition—the gentleman from Iowa. [Applause and laughter.]

And my friend from Iowa comes up and tells us to "beware," that "a burnt child fears the fire," and that a bull pup got a smell of a live wire or an electric motor or something of that kind while engaged in a scientific investigation, and that all sorts of things happened to the bull pup, and that the American people similarly had smelled at a free-trade tariff in 1892–93 and the consequence was that they got blown up by Coxey's army coming on to Washington. Now, it is utterly useless for me to tell the gentleman from Iowa that Coxey's army came here about a year and some months before there was any change in the old Republican McKinley bill, the highest protectionist measure that America ever saw except the present Dingley bill. It is utterly useless for me to produce the dates on him. It is utterly useless for me to remind him of the fact that he and I were in the House at that time and that he ought to know or that he "might, could, would, or should" have known it was long before the McKinley bill was repealed and long before the Wilson-Gorman bill was framed. Equally useless to tell him that the panic of 1893 arose and afterwards spent its fury under the McKinley bill and before the Wilson-Gorman bill was conceived or brought forth. It is utterly useless, because the gentleman has got so much in the habit that he does not know how to act or talk, or think, or "think he is thinking" otherwise. It reminds me of an old mule, on one of the old Tennessee places I used to hear about, that was in the habit of going around and around and around pulling a lever to grind meal in one of these old-fashioned horse mills, and after a while the old mule got old and blind and got so he could not see new things of any description, and after a while the mill burned down and the old mule, true to the traditions of his former life, went every morning to that old mill and traveled around and around and around, and those who knew him best told me that his countenance bore the appearance of such good-natured pleasantry while he was going around that it made all of his neighbors rejoice in his subjective happiness. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman furnished all sorts of figures to show how prosperous we have been in the exportation of products of the farm—unprotected, by the way—and then he undertakes to tell us that "the price of products depends upon the surplus." Now, he will never repeat that again as long as he lives, I believe, if he will stop to listen and think a minute. The price of nothing in the world ever depended upon a surplus. The price of all commodities in the world, which the world uses, depends upon the world's supply and the world's demand. As far as the price is concerned, it does not make a bit of difference where the product is sold. Geography of sale has nothing to do with it. It is no more important to me as a cotton planter that a million of bales of cotton should be demanded and sold in South Africa than it is for me that an equal number of bales be demanded and sold in Mississippi. It does not make a particle of difference to me whether my cotton is sold at Timbuctoo, in Africa, or sold to the adjoining county. The only thing that matters to me is whether I get a lower or a higher price for it, and in a given year if there are 10,000,000 bales of cotton made in the whole world cotton will be worth from 15 to 25 cents a pound, and if there are 18,000,000 bales made cotton will be worth from 4 to 6 cents, provided always that the demand remains the same. It is not a question of how much of that cotton is sold in Mississippi or in the United States or in Great Britain or France or Germany, it is a question of how much of that cotton is raised to be sold to the world, and on the other side is how much of the mill power and consuming capacity the world makes an efficient demand for it—that is, a demand from people able to pay for it. The one factor is how much the world is producing, not how much Mississippi produces, not how much the United States produces, but how much the whole world produces; the other factor is how many uses there are for it by people able to pay.

Why, the greatest superstition in the world is the idea that because you have a factory force of fellows brought down, let us say, from New York or out of France or out of Germany to an adjoining town to your home that that makes your cotton or your wheat worth any more. If the same force of people bought the same amount of cotton or the same amount of wheat while they were residents of New York, or Germany, or France, it would have had exactly the same effect upon the price of your wheat or your cotton. There is but one difference in the world, the American standard of wages is higher, and it is higher because we have more cheap and fertile land than any other country in the world, and therefore more opportunities to make money in the natural pursuit of man, and therefore we require a higher bribe to go out of our natural pursuit into factory life. There is this difference, and none other. The American wage is higher and the fellows brought down from New York or France or Germany into an adjoining town earn more money, and in proportion as they earn more money they can buy that much more wheat and more cotton, but their residence has nothing in the world to do with it. Increased wage is, of course, increased demand. But wage depends upon the number of people wanting work on one side and the amount of work calling for wage-earners on the other, and not on legislation—either of the tariff or of other varieties.

It is the entire product of an article set over against the entire demand for the article that fixes the market prices. Now, I know that my friend from Iowa will never repeat that error about "surplus fixing price." [Laughter.] Surplus is only a part of the total price-fixing product.

Why, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] says that the Germans make things and put on them "Made in Germany," but that he does not want the Germans to write across a tariff bill of the United States, "Made in Germany." And yet, under the protecting ægis of our remarkable Secretary of State and our great President, who is worshiped in the bottom of your hearts by every one of you Republicans—it is no lip service you are paying him from day to day, not at all—the Administration has of late branded a part of our tariff system, "Made in Germany." I frequently think how our last German-American modus vivendi must bring a sort of depression into the heart of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY], who, a little while ago, was being interviewed and telling how he was going to raise a maximum tariff stick over the head of Kaiser Wilhelm and all the other effete European powers, and make them come to taw—in short, was talking just the sort of talk that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] was talking this morning, namely, to the effect that we did not propose to let anybody else on the surface of the earth dictate anything about our tariff laws; that the very sacred scripture laid upon the sacred table inside of the sacred temple of American institutions was the Dingley bill, and that we did not propose to let Kaiser Wilhelm or anybody else question it. But Kaiser Wilhelm did question it; and when Kaiser Wilhelm got through questioning it, I notice he entered into some sort of a modus vivendi, and we have agreed to "consulate" German goods at towns of manufacture instead of at the ports of shipment, and we agreed to do a great many other things that will reduce the number of dollars and cents or the number of marks that the German will pay upon his goods when brought into America, and therefore enable him to sell the goods somewhat cheaper, and thereby, I am glad to say to the humiliation of stand-patters, enable the American consumer to buy them so much cheaper. "Made in Germany?" The gentleman does not want any tariff "made in Germany!" What is the difference between having your law branded "Made in Germany" and having your administrative regulations branded "Made in Germany?" [Laughter.] The Secretary of the Treasury has, moreover, invited us to brand the law "Made in Germany."

Now, a few words upon that question. I do not agree with my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] that the right way to persuade people to reciprocal trade relations is to hold a big stick over them and threaten them. I do not think you gain much in this world by going around with a stick, anyhow. That has not been my experience. Not only the Bible, but common sense teaches that "a soft answer turneth away wrath." I had this idea which I introduced into a bill. I did it in consequence of the conclusions of a great reciprocity convention. The delegates to that reciprocity convention were so overwhelmingly Republican that they would not even allow anybody to hint at a profession of faith in Democratic ideals; but still they demanded a maximum and minimum tariff. I knew what they wanted was a minimum tariff, because I knew what they wanted to do was to induce people abroad to a more friendly state of mind toward us, and to have grow out of that friendly state of mind a more friendly reciprocal trade relation. I therefore introduced a bill providing for a minimum tariff, and I sent it to the Committee on Ways and Means, presided over by the Nestor of the Congress of the United States, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and the membership of which was never exceeded in any Congress by its membership in this House—in numbers at any rate. [Laughter.] I sent that bill to the Committee on Ways and Means and took you Republicans at your own word. You will remember in section 3 of the Dingley bill you provided—although you provided it for only two years, and the time has now expired—that the President could enter into reciprocal trade relations with anybody by reducing duties 20 per cent and by proclaiming that duty for that particular nation the moment he proclaimed at the same time the fact that that nation had given us certain trade advantages. I, therefore, provided in my bill that the minimum tariff of the United States hereafter should be the present rates less 20 per cent—that is, each tax should be four-fifths of the present tax.

I brought that matter before the Ways and Means Committee. I had childlike confidence in the patriotism and intelligence of the Republican majority upon that committee. My friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] had the same degree of confidence, and I shall never forget the look of complacent and confiding optimism upon his childlike countenance the day I brought the bill up in committee. But when I did so and faced my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] with it our childlike confidence was disappointed, and the demand of the reciprocity convention was voted down by a strict party vote—all the Republicans on the committee against this bill of constructive statesmanship, all the Democrats for it.

Now, my friend MCCLEARY says, "I want a maximum;" I said, "I want a minimum tariff." He said, "Let us retaliate;" I said, "Let us reciprocate." He said, "Let us threaten;" I said, "Let us invite." He said, "Let us dare on the dogs of war;" I said, "Let us invite the doves of peace." [Applause.] That is, in short meter, Republicanism on one side and Democracy on the other. And what was there at the end of it all? I invoked the doves of peace, and the countenance of my Republican friend from New York, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, at once resembled the warlike god of Mars when he is getting ready for battle, and somebody moved to lay the bill on the table. They did it, and they would have laid me on the table except out of pure parliamentary courtesy. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] talks about "our great home market;" and then he says our foreign market is not worth a tithe of it. Why, it is not worth a fifth of a tithe of it. One of the most curious things in the world to me is to see a Republican upon this floor, a protectionist, wedded to the idols of the protectionist, standing in the American Congress and bragging and boasting, Congress after Congress, about our immense "home market." What created our immense home market? Why, thank God, it is the only thing we have that the protectionist can not touch. [Loud applause.] You say that we ought not to have that foreign market extended at the expense of throwing away our home market. I thank God we can not throw away the home market, in view of the absolute free unencumbered trade from Maine to San Diego, Cal., from the coast opposite Vancouver Island to the utmost extent of the Peninsula of Florida, from the Great Lakes down to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific—a scope of territory with the greatest opportunities of industrial development that the world in all of its history has thus far seen, which has been built up and made what it is by the absolute freedom of trade. [Loud applause.]

What right have you Republicans to boast of "our home market?" Why, if you could do it upon your so-called "principles" and your ideas, you would protect Iowa against the abundance of all the other States. Then, if the people of Iowa, in spite of your "protecting" them against Mississippi and Pennsylvania and Massachusetts and New York, grew prosperous anyhow, not because you had "protected" them against these other great Commonwealths, but in spite of your attempted trade obstructions, you would rise on this floor with the same childlike credulity and self-stultification you have to-day displayed and attribute that prosperity to the fact that Iowa was protected against Illinois and Indiana. Why, the very formation of the Government of the United States was a denial of the fundamental principles of the protectionist. We constructed it for the purpose of having a free country and freedom of trade between the several States forming the United States. Still gentlemen rise and cry "free trade," as if the cry ought to affright children. I would not be afraid of the cry; I am not afraid of anything with the word "free" in it. Free religion, free speech, free assembly, free trade, free anything. Anything with the word "free" in it does not excite my dread or fear; but when gentlemen talk about "free trade" they know it is absolutely impossible that anybody with common sense and wanting to carry on a Government should advocate free trade in the United States. They know that the Democratic party has never at any time, before or since the war, advocated free trade. I will not say that if it were possible to advocate it practically that it would not be a very much more beautiful and symmetrical doctrine than the one you are advocating; but you—all of you—know, as a matter of fact, that there is nobody advocating it in the United States now, and you know that the Democratic idea of raising revenue by tariff is the idea of taxing the American consumers as nearly as possible equally and uniformly in proportion to the strength of the back of the taxpayer to bear the burden of the tax.

You know that if the Democratic party could make an ideal Democratic tariff that it would include upon the list a tax on nearly all articles to be consumed. That a small tax would be levied, making it smaller and smaller in proportion as it became more and more a question of the living of the people and the living of the people's industries, and that a large tax would be levied on luxuries—larger and larger in proportion as it was more and more purely a luxury. Many duties would be almost nominal—a mere statistical tax upon the raw material, or upon what you might call the raw materials of life, the necessaries of a man, to live by eating and the coarser clothing—necessary food, bread and meat. The duties needed for revenue and whose levy would be unavoidable would incidentally furnish "protection" enough for every man not an industrial coward. Why is it that you gentlemen are scared? Is it because you have no confidence in the intelligence of your own people? Why are you compelled every time this question is brought up in this House to refer to a rhetorical figure of speech by my friend from Missouri, saying that he wished there was "no custom-houses in this country," when you know at the time he said it he did not say it with any applicability to legislation practically, and that he was speaking of the theory of free trade, if he had tabula rasa to write upon and could make the conditions anew to suit himself—no Supreme Court, with its income-tax decision, and no Federal Government as in the present form? Our forefathers had that chance for a continent and wrote on the tabula rasa the words, "Free trade between the States and Territories." What fool thinks we have suffered by it? My friend from Missouri has not and never had and never will have tabula rasa to write "Free trade between the nations"—knows he has not; moreover, you know he knows it.

Why is it that whenever you come to discuss this matter, instead of discussing what we actually propose to do, you always go off and discuss something of that sort?

Now, what do you propose to do? I have another bill that I introduced, and that bill was to reduce the duties upon articles that were subject to taxation, wherever those articles were taxed at over 100 per cent, to 100 per cent. I understand that the gentleman who presides over this House as its Speaker, for whom I entertain a personal affection not exceeded by the personal affection that I entertain for any man in the House, was interviewed about that bill, and when interviewed he said that he reckoned it was "one of John Sharp Williams's jokes, because there were no duties over 100 per cent." And I heard, too, although I did not see it in a newspaper, but it was told me later, that my friend the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE] said he thought, too, it was one of JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS'S jokes.

Mr. PAYNE. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, then. That speaks well for the gentleman's intelligence.

Mr. PAYNE. I am glad to have the commendation of so high an order of intellect as the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You do well, because "praise from Sir Hubert is praise indeed."

Mr. PAYNE. Coming all the way from Heidelberg.

Mr. AMES. "Made in Germany."

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, by the way, I had sense enough to come away from it, too. In a magazine article which I have here entitled, "Tariff revision, reciprocity, and the farmer," are some of the articles which pay over 100 per cent duty.

"Chalk, such as tailor's, billiards, lead, and French, 106 per cent duty." There were $34,000 worth of importations, and the duty paid was $36,000.

On boracic acid, which is an article of ordinary use, two of the greatest borax mines of the world being in this country, the duty is 122 per cent. We imported $30,000 worth and paid a duty of $36,000 on the $30,000 worth imported.

On tannic acid or tannin, the duty is 103 per cent.

On nitric spirits of ether, 250 per cent duty; on sulphuric ether, 236 per cent duty; cotton duck, over 8 square yards to the pound, 112 per cent duty.

Manufacture of cordage, cables of fiber of seven lea yarns, 108 per cent duty; another size, 128 per cent; still another, 150 per cent; a fourth, 36 per cent, and a fifth, 300 per cent. As a matter of course we did not import any cordage of that kind, because the duty is so high.

Gill netting, five lea yarns, 104 per cent. Even with the duty there were $1,980 worth imported, and the duty paid upon this was $2,940.

"Firecrackers"—surely the poor little children ought not to be taxed when they become patriotic on the Fourth of July—"126 per cent."

"Cheap spectacles"—that the poor people wear—"116 per cent."

Common window glass, which is the kind ordinarily used, 24 by 30, 107 per cent duty. We imported $55,000 worth, and the duty paid was $59,000. Size 24 by 36, 125 per cent duty; there were $50,000 worth of imports and $65,000 was the duty paid. Size 30 by 40, 129 per cent duty; above 40 by 50, 255 per cent duty.

Looking-glasses, 24 by 30, 130 per cent duty.

Plate glass, 24 by 60, 142 per cent duty.

Pocket-knife blades, 103 per cent duty.

Stocks for double-barreled guns, 389 per cent duty.

Here I will give you some actual importation—values and duties paid all set out. The duties compound, partially ad valorem and partly specific, amount together in each case to over 100 per cent—woolens, flaxens, dress goods, foods.

Tariff, 100 per cent; watch movements, if having more than seven jewels, 50 cents each and 25 per cent ad valorem, act 1897, paragraph 191. Mica, 12 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem. (See Evening Post.)

Immense quantities of mica are used in this country, and the quantity consumed has very largely increased in the past two or three years, and is increasing very rapidly, as large quantities of it are used in electrical contrivances, and on account of the high duty on it a deposit of mica is more valuable than a gold mine, as all the tools you need to mine it is a pick and shovel.

Now, my object in bringing this up is this: There are two classes of Republicans upon this question of protectionism. One frankly taxes the balance of the world to enrich certain industries in his own district, and the higher he can tax them and the more he can enrich his own constituents by exploiting others the better satisfied he is. Now, with him we need not argue at all, because he is not open to ratiocination. He is only open to one argument, and that is to prove to him that a schedule does not enrich his particular fellow—possibly, though not always a campaign-raising fellow.

The duty on mica is claimed in a mica company prospectus to be 150 per cent. It is really sometimes 4,000 per cent; the value of mica waste in Canada being $3 per ton and the duty being 6 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem. But there is a class of Republicans who believe in the protective tariff as a principle upon the ground that it maintains the superiority of the standard of American wage to the standard of wage abroad. With that man you can reason, and with him I propose to reason here and before the country; and I tell you that I have so much confidence in the sanity of the American intellect that I believe that that class of conservative and sensible Republicans are going to go back upon this outrageous Dingley scale of exploitation.

With him you can reason this way. You say that he admits that the raison d'être—the cause for the existence—of protectionism is to make up the difference between what you call the pauper labor scale of Europe and your own great American scale (and the scale of wages, as I have more than once tried to demonstrate, does not come from the tariff, but from our grander industrial opportunities, and from the fact that there is more demand for labor in America, in proportion to the supply of labor, than in any other country in the world, except some parts of South Africa, where they had a higher scale of wage than we had until they introduced Chinese labor and broke it down). This man, however, believes that the tariff can and does maintain this difference. If it be true that you want to make up by your tariff scale for the difference between what you call the "European pauper labor" wage and your own laborer's wage, the height to which the tariff ought to go would be the height in dollars and cents, or in percentage of that exact difference, whatever it is, as a factor in the cost of the product.

Now, then, the most expert statisticians say upon an average the labor cost of commodities is not 50 per cent of the entire price of the finished product. There are very few articles indeed concerning which it may be predicated in truth that the labor cost at the factory entering into the entire cost is as much as 50 per cent of the entire cost, but in order to be perfectly fair and that the American people may see that I have exposed this pretense, I introduced a bill providing that wherever the duty—specific or ad valorem or compound—is over 100 per cent of the price of the product it shall be reduced to 100 per cent.

Now, the blindest and most fanatical stand-patter in the world will not undertake to say that the amount of labor cost in the cost of finished product can amount to more than the entire cost of the product. A fortiori the difference between the American labor cost which enters into it and the foreign labor cost entering into an identical article could not possibly be over the entire cost of the product. I am going to put that bill up before my friend from New York, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the other Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means and see what they think about it.

The President of the United States himself has said, although I am not quoting his exact language, that the excuse or justification, perhaps, he says, for a protective tariff lies in the fact that you ought to make up at general expense, patriotically, the difference between the scale of foreign wages entering into a product, with the importation of which you are confronted, and the scale of wages that would enter into the identical product if made in the United States. This bill is my test of Republican labor-loving pretense, and also of tariff-revising pretense. Let us see whether it is true, as the newspapers have said, that any sort of agreement or understanding was entered into between the President of the United States and the Speaker of this House, whereby the one was to help along the railroad rate bill and the other was to delay any recommendation of tariff revision. Let us see if the President of the United States sincerely bases his advocacy of protection upon the reasons that he has given or whether he entertains some other reason. Let me say to every one of you that those of you who say wage difference is your reason for voting for protectionism can not vote against my bill, which merely reduces the duty to 100 per cent of the fair invoice price of the article imported.

These figures I have given you are based upon the actual prices of importations. There are other illustrations in the woolen schedule. On some things of the woolen schedule that the laboring men and the laboring women must wear the duty runs over 100 per cent. You say you want the tariff "revised by its friends." In Gods' name let its friends act. It has a conservative friend in the White House, if he is properly quoted. It has fanatical friends or of the other and reasonable class on this floor and in the Senate. You are upon the Government horse and you are in the saddle. Ride the horse, but ride him so that you shall not trample on the rights and liberties of the people unnecessarily. The horse going any gait must trample upon something. Any tax must hurt somebody no matter how small, no matter how reasonable the tax. But you—its friends—revise it, so as to hurt less—ride so as to trample on fewer things.

I am not appealing to Democrats who want revenue tariff, I am making an appeal to Republicans who say they want protection for American labor. If you are not hypocrites, if you are telling the truth, if that is your real reason for wanting it, then 100 per cent, in the name of common sense, will give you all the protection that the labor cost entering into an article could possibly under any circumstances require.

I am making the argument from your own standpoint, not from mine. Act now while you are in power; do something. Which novel is it of Dickens's where he describes the sacred groove within the governmental departments of Great Britain where all studied only the art of knowing "how not to do things?" One fellow would receive something and back it over to another, "respectfully referred," and the other fellow would get it and he would back it over to somebody else, "respectfully referred." This Republican talk of revising the tariff in the interests of the American people and to "suit changed conditions" reminds me of that circumlocution office. You are always referring it back to somebody else. I want the American people to know how many of you are sincere and how many of you are hypocritical when you say that you levy duties for the sake of American labor; that you do not levy them for the sake of enriching American capital; that you do not levy them for the purpose of furnishing a shelter behind which great combinations can be formed to exploit the American people, while they sell cheaper abroad than they do at home; that your sole object is to "benefit American labor" and to make up for the difference between the wage scale here and the wage scale abroad. Oh, if I had had that only in view, and fairly so, I could have gone further and said this: That there is hardly an article manufactured the labor cost of which is 50 per cent of its entire cost.

I could have said that there is hardly an article manufactured the labor cost of which constitutes more than 50 per cent of its entire cost, and then I might have said that in very few instances indeed does the American wage amount to over twice what the foreign wage is, as in comparison with continental Europe and England, leaving out the yellow races, where it is sometimes a little bit more, and that, therefore, if you would cut the 50 per cent of labor cost in two and make the duty 25 per cent on a fair ad valorem basis, that this 25 per cent duty would amply protect American labor, from your own Republican—pretense—standpoint. I am speaking now from your standpoint—that it would amply make up the difference between the wage scale here and the wage scale abroad. Ah, but there are lots of you who know that what you have got in mind is not to make up any difference between any American wage scale and a wage scale abroad; that what you have really in mind is to build up this and that and the other industry represented by your constituents and to enrich them at the expense of the general constituency of the country. And how? By enabling your party pets to sell at higher prices; and to whom? To their fellow-citizens.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand the gentleman from Mississippi to say that he thinks a tariff of 25 per cent would sufficiently protect American labor from foreign competition?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said 25 per cent would cover the difference of labor cost in almost any article identically manufactured here and abroad.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one more question? Last summer in Japan I went into a woolen factory——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, the gentleman will remember that I conditioned my statement by saying I was referring to England and continental countries and not to the yellow races.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. While in Japan last summer I went into a woolen factory. They had German up-to-date machinery, 600 hands employed—about 400 men and perhaps 200 women and girls. I asked the superintendent where they got the wool. He said from Australia, free of duty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will pardon me, the gentleman has totally misunderstood me, I think I can gather from the character of the question he is asking.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman can not tell until I have finished the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that the difference between the American wage scale and the foreign wage scale was only 25 per cent. I said that the difference between that part of the total cost of the product which was due to the foreign labor and that part of the total cost of the product due to the American labor would not exceed 25 per cent of the total cost of the product—an entirely different question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I inquired of the superintendent how long they worked a day. He replied, "Eleven hours." I asked him what he paid for his help, and he said they paid the men 45 sen, which is 22½ cents gold, and the women 40 sen, which is 20 cents gold, a day of eleven hours. They were making flannel blankets, such as are manufactured and used in this country. They were working eleven hours a day, with free wool from Australia, wool raised on ranches where they have flocks often of from two million to four or more million sheep each, where there is no winter, and where the herder is paid about 20 or 25 cents a day. Now, what tariff does the gentleman think would enable our laborers making such blankets in our mills, paid a dollar and a half a day with no better machinery, to compete at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I will have to get some further information from the gentleman first. Now, I will ask him a question with a view of getting information, and then I will try to answer his question. How much product per day did one of these laborers turn out?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The machinery ran as fast as it does over here, I thought. I have been in many woolen factories and I never have seen machinery run more rapidly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask the gentleman how much product the machine turned out in a day, but I asked how much product did the laborer turn out. For example, in parts of England one woman attends to four looms. In New England she attends to six looms running just as fast.

Mr. STANLEY. In Henderson, Ky., one woman attends to eight looms.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in some parts of Saxony a woman only attends to three. In other words, in order for me to determine what the percentage of labor cost is in that product I must know how much product each laborer turns out. Now, then, I had, summer before last, in Yazoo, Miss., this experience: A friend of mine came to me and said: "We have a lot of Italians, Swedes, and darkies engaged down here digging to put the new sewerage system in, and they are paying the darkies a dollar and a quarter a day and paying the white men two dollars and a quarter." "Well," I said, "that is not square, because they ought to pay them for equal work the same pay;" but he said: "They are not doing equal work. I went down there the other day, having nothing else to do, and I sat down and watched them, and the white men threw out three shovels to the darkies' one." Now, you see, when I came to a knowledge of the actual facts I found there was still an inequality, but that the darky was getting overpaid instead of underpaid in proportion to work done.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one moment. Later on in order to equalize them they had to do this: They put the Italians and Swedes down in the ditch to throw dirt up on the bank, and it was all one darky could do to take the dirt away as fast as it was thrown out by one white man, although all he had to do was to shovel it away, while the white fellow below had to overcome gravity as well as to dig. Now, if the gentleman could give me the information I asked I think he would find out that when it comes to the making of that blanket that 25 per cent of the cost of Japanese manufacture—that is, of the price in Japan without the tariff, you understand, especially if the wool was free and if the labor was free and if there is no tariff at all—that 25 per cent of that price plus freight to America would more than make up the difference between that remarkably cheap Japanese labor and our remarkably high-priced but also remarkably efficient labor.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I can not, of course, give the figures which the gentleman asked for in that statement of his, but I can say this, however, by way of general impression: While the Japanese have only recently gone into this sort of business, it is my judgment from what I saw that they will equal the people of any country in this world in anything in a comparatively few years. They have intellect, ambition, energy; they have everything that we possess, except possibly not as fair a complexion——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And not as much physical strength.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But intellect does not depend upon complexion. These people can very soon be taught to work these machines with as great rapidity and skill as any operative in the United States. It is only a matter of a very few years when they will do anything with that machinery, and do it just as well as we do it here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman—and after this I am going to take my seat. I am, I started to say, apprehensive, but apprehensive would not be the right word, because no man ought to be apprehensive of the prosperity and development and growth of other people; but I will say I am very persuaded that in the course of time the Japanese will make as good factory laborers as there are in the world. But the minute he does become as efficient as other labor he is going to receive the wage that other labor receives. He will receive it upon the same principle that if you put on an immense head of water that water will yet seek its level. The great river of labor in this world, the great ocean of prices in this world, always seek their level, and if the Japanese gets to the point where he can do a New England mechanic's or operative's work that Japanese is not going to continue to stay in a country where he is paid half price. His threat or intent or attempt to leave, even before he leaves, will raise wages in Japan. Already that result is beginning to be accomplished in Japan. When he reaches that period of intelligence, he is going to Australia, to South Africa, to Great Britain, and to everywhere else where men who are efficient labor and other men are willing to pay for it. Pari passu wages will rise in Japan. Just in proportion as men become equalized in efficiency they become approximately equalized in remuneration, not perfectly, of course—never—but just as water seeking its level from away up at Lake Itasca down to the Gulf of Mexico never finds its level perfect—not even after it reaches the Gulf, because the winds and the tides destroy it—but is yet always seeking its level, and upon the whole is finding a comparative or approximate level.

It is from just the same ignoring of a principle that gentlemen talk about gold leaving one country and going into another, and hurting the country that it leaves. Gold seeks the place of lowest price. That is the place of its highest purchasing power. Labor seeks also the place of its greatest purchasing power.

Why is it that this great immigration movement has been going on since colonial times—long before the Revolution—from Europe to America? It is just the great father of labor—waters rolling on and seeking the place of the highest wage, the place where the purchasing power of muscle, as measured in other commodities, is greatest, and where the price of other things, as measured in muscle, is least.

Mr. HAMILTON. I may have misunderstood the gentleman, but will he state his scientific authority for sayinlg that only 30 to 50 per cent of the cost value of the finished product represents labor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that Mr. Edward Atkinson, who now unfortunately is dead, made those figures. I can not now recall just where or when I read them.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman state where he made that statement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not now recall, as I said when the gentleman asked me. But since Edward Atkinson stated——

Mr. HAMILTON. It has been stated generally that 80 per cent represents the value of labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am talking about manufactured products. You take corn, for example, where it is pulled by hand, and I suppose that 90 per cent would be labor cost.

Mr. HAMILTON. What would the gentleman say as to manufactured products? What per cent represents labor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It depends upon the product.

Mr. HAMILTON. On the whole—the scientific average?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I said was it was very seldom, indeed, that the labor percentage, the labor cost, formed 50 per cent of the total cost of the product.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is it not generally accepted as a scientific fact that 80 or 90 per cent represents the element of labor in the finished product?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not. And in making that statement I think I would like to ask the gentleman where his scientific authority for that is?

Mr. HAMILTON. I was trying to think when I asked the gentleman the question. As I recall it, I think I have it from Lalor's Political Encyclopædia—a very able article which appears in that publication.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will look at it, he will find that he has got a statement of all the products—agricultural and all others.

Mr. WEISSE. For the information of the gentleman, if he will take the abstract of the census of 1900, he will find that there were manufactured about $13,000,000,000 of products, and Carroll D. Wright gives 17½ per cent of the cost of the manufactured article as what the laborer received as his share.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I could have furnished that, but what I stated was, not that the average percentage of labor cost was 50 per cent, but that in some exceptional cases with manufactured articles it seldom reached 50 per cent. The average percentage is not 20 per cent of the total cost of the manufactured article. It is very seldom, indeed, that in any manufactured article the labor cost is 50 per cent of the entire cost of the product. Now, mark you, not selling price, not retail or selling price to the jobber, but cost of outturn at the factory.

Mr. HAMILTON. But the value of the finished product?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the cost of making it at the factory, not its market value. The latter involves the manufacturer's profit.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman will recognize it is a very important element in this controversy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a very important element in this incidental controversy between you and me, but it is not at all important as far as the proposition that I have faced you with this morning—my bill—is concerned, at least the proposition I have faced the Republicans in the Ways and Means Committee with to-day and will face them with later on on a vote, because, in order to avoid all room for argument, I provide in that bill that wherever the duty is over 100 per cent it shall be reduced to 100 per cent.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman recognizes even in those cases that where the duty may be 100 per cent the price of the article is, in many instances, far below the duty exacted. And what difference does the duty make in that case?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see what the gentleman is talking about now. He has gone off on something else. Let us keep to this.

Mr. HAMILTON. I was trying to follow the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the gentleman has gone off on something else—on how much the tariff adds to the price of the product. I say you people pretend that what you want to do is to compensate the American laborer to the proportion necessary in order to make up the difference between the American wage scale and the foreign wage scale. Now, I say, if you are sincere about that, you will not even undertake an argument, that a duty of 100 per cent is not more than sufficient.

Mr. HAMILTON. I say that that is one of the chief arguments in favor of protective tariff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You will not even undertake an argument that the labor cost of any article is ever above the entire cost of the article, will you?

Mr. HAMILTON. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is one frank answer that I have gotten out of one Republican lately on that question. It could not be, could it? It would be mighty absurd to suppose it would, would it not?

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman is making his argument.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman from New York proceed now?

Mr. SHERMAN. One moment, before I move that the committee rise. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] asked me some question this morning in reference to education in Alaska. I did not have at hand at the moment the data upon that subject. Dr. Sheldon Jackson has been for many years the superintendent of education for Alaska, having charge, not of the education of the Indians alone, but of all the citizens of Alaska. The Government has been appropriating for twenty years, in the sundry civil appropriation bill, sums running from fifteen to fifty thousand dollars for that purpose, and last year, in the sundry civil bill, $50,000 was appropriated for education in Alaska. And to any gentleman who is curious to look up the matter in detail, he will find in volume 2 of the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1903, on pages 2232 down to 2247, a full report of the expenditures of that money for the education of Indians and other children in Alaska, a very considerable proportion of the money being expended for the education of Indians. As I said this morning, only $5,000 was directly appropriated out of the Indian funds for the education of Indians in Alaska. That is all I desire to say about that.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15331—the Indian appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken in this debate, and those who may speak to-morrow, may have the privilege to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DAM ACROSS RED LAKE RIVER, MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill permitting the building of a dam across the Red Lake River, Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4128) permitting the building of a dam across the Red Lake River at or near the junction of Black River with said Red Lake River in Red Lake County, Minn.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to William J. Murphy, his successors and assigns, to build a dam across the Red Lake River at or near the junction of the Black River, so called, with said Red Lake River, in Red Lake County, Minn., for the development of water power, and such works and structures in connection therewith as may be necessary or convenient in the development of said power and in the utilization of the power thereby developed: Provided, That the plans for the construction of said dam and appurtenant works shall be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the commencement of the construction of the same: And provided further, That the said William J. Murphy, his successors or assigns, shall not deviate from such plans after such approval, either before or after the completion of such structures, unless the modification of said plans shall have previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That there shall be placed and maintained in connection with said dam a sluiceway so arranged as to permit logs, timber, and lumber to pass around, through, or over said dam without unreasonable delay or hindrance and without toll or charges: And provided further, That the dam shall be so constructed that the Government of the United States may at any time construct in connection therewith a suitable lock for navigation purposes, and may at any time, without compensation, control the said dam so far as shall be necessary for purposes of navigation, but shall not destroy the water power developed by said dam and structures to any greater extent than may be necessary to provide proper facilities for navigation, and that the Secretary of War may at any time require and enforce at the expense of the owners such modifications and changes in the construction of such dam as he may deem advisable in the interests of navigation: And provided further, That suitable fishways, to be approved by the United States Fish Commission, shall be constructed and maintained at said dam by the said William J. Murphy, his successors or assigns.

SEC. 2. That in case any litigation arises from the building of said dam, or from the obstruction of said river by said dam or appurtenant works, cases may be tried in the proper courts, as now provided for that purpose in the State of Minnesota and in the courts of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt said structures from the operation of same.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void unless the dam herein authorized be commenced within two years and be completed within three years from the time of the passage of this act.

SEC. 4. That the right to amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Amend, on page 3, line 13, by striking out the words "two years" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one year."

Mr. DALZELL. Reserving the right to object, do I understand this is a Senate bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. This is a Senate bill, and it has been reported favorably by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House, and is on the Calendar.

Mr. DALZELL. It comes from a committee of this House?

Mr. STEENERSON. It comes from a committee of this House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there a similar House bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no House bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE DELAWARE RIVER.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3288) to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Pennsylvania and Newark Railroad Company, or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River, which is identical with House bill 11505, which has been unanimously favorably reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows anything about what has ever become of that Mann bill that was passed?

Mr. SHERMAN. This has nothing to do with the Mann bill, Mr. Speaker, and I am not asking unanimous consent. I am asking that this bill be put upon its passage, because I have the right to do so under the rules.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am asking for information. If the Mann bill has been passed by the Senate and has been signed by the President, then bridge bills have to be drawn in accordance with that bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is present and will answer the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the bill has been reported by the Committee of the Senate, but has not passed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It has not passed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar House bill will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4805) to prohibit aliens from taking or gathering sponges in the waters of the United States, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PILES, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15583) to authorize the Madison Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in St. Francis County, Ark., at or near the town of Madison, in said county and State, reported it without amendment.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10101) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey to the State of Minnesota a certain tract of land situated in the county of Dakota, State of Minnesota, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10480) for the relief of certain settlers upon land within the indemnity limits of the present St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 83) for a report, etc., upon the preservation of Niagara Falls, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (S. 4872) to amend section 5153 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This was so evidently a mistake, as the bill has nothing to do with matters over which that committee has jurisdiction, that I ask leave to report it back with the request that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. FORAKER. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 24) authorizing the President of the United States to invite the Government of Great Britain to join in the formation of an international commission to examine and report upon the diminution in volume of water passing over the Falls of Niagara, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator reporting the joint resolution to make some statement as to the necessity of such a commission.

Mr. FORAKER. The subject is a very important one. It is possible that the commission is larger than it need be. The Committee on Foreign Relations approved the measure simply as it was introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT]. There was no suggestion that there should be a less number of commissioners. Is it the Senator's idea that the number of commissioners might be smaller?

Mr. TELLER. What I want the Senator to direct our attention to, if he will, is the necessity of such a commission and whether the committee have considered that question.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, no one in the Committee on Foreign Relations raised any question as to the propriety of the appointment of a commission, and I supposed that that was a very proper way, inasmuch as two governments are interested in the subject, to approach a consideration of it. I do not know in what other way we could act with efficiency in regard to the matter than through some sort of an arrangement of this character.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I am not finding any fault with the committee, but I want to know what necessity there is for any action on our part.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, Mr. President, I have been memorialized, as I supposed every other Senator had been who was a member of this body, for the last five or six months to the effect that something should be done to preserve Niagara Falls. I understand that the waters are being drawn off for electrical plants and other purposes to such an extent that the falls are likely to be entirely destroyed, practically so, at any rate, and that there is a pressing necessity that some steps should be taken to look into the matter, to investigate it, and determine what if anything should be done. I supposed that was a point we were all agreed about. I have assumed that the information given in these memorials was correct. I expect I have received a hundred of them, and I think every other Senator here has. I think if for commercial purposes or on any other account the falls are in any danger of being destroyed, we should take some steps to take action with respect to it if the action be necessary.

I am just informed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that a joint resolution on this subject has passed the House and that it is now under consideration in the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game. I was not familiar with that fact. He informs me also that there is a commission already in existence on whom it is proposed to devolve this investigation. In view of this information, which I did not have the benefit of, and which no member of the Committee on Foreign Relations apparently had the benefit of, I will ask, if there is objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution, that it may go over until we look further into the matter.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word. I was not aware that there was any bill which had passed the House. I was about to say that I thought if we had any control of this matter we could exercise it without the assistance of Great Britain, so far as our part of the river is concerned. I am myself inclined to think that it belongs to the State of New York to settle that question and not the General Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his request for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. FORAKER. Is it understood that there is objection to its consideration?

Mr. TELLER. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. FRYE. Let it go to the Calendar.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that it may go to the Calendar, and I shall call it up at a subsequent time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

JOSE I. RODRIGUEZ.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following resolution; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay Jose I. Rodriguez the sum of $60 (for translating certain papers for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations) from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

COURT AT EVANSTON, WYO.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 535) to amend and reenact section 1 of chapter 77 of volume 27 of the United States Statutes at Large, being "An act to provide for a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Evanston, Wyo.," approved May 23, 1892, to report it back favorably without amendment. It is a very short bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend and reenact the section so as to read as follows:

That hereafter and until otherwise provided by law there shall be held annually, on the second Tuesday in July each year, a term of the circuit and district courts for the district of Wyoming at the town of Evanston, in said district, said term to be in addition to the terms now required by law to be held at the city of Cheyenne, in said district.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FUEL IN ALASKA.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 40) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell to citizens of Nome, Alaska, limited quantities of coal for domestic uses, to report it favorably without amendment. It is a matter of six lines and will lead to no debate. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution just read.

Mr. TELLER. If there is no debate, I shall not object. I will reserve the right to object if there is any debate on it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8103) to authorize the construction of a bridge between Fort Snelling Reservation and St. Paul, Minn., to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall have to object at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] has given notice that he wishes to address the Senate this morning. We are to vote on the statehood bill upon Friday, and there are several Senators who wish to speak on that bill. I wish to enter now an objection to any further business that does not properly belong to the morning hour in order to give the Senator from West Virginia an opportunity to take the floor.

Mr. FRYE. House bill 8103, reported by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES], was reported from two committees in the House of Representatives—the Committee on Military Affairs and also the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It was referred here to the Committee on Commerce, and we, on considering it, did not regard it as necessary to send it to the Committee on Military Affairs and authorized that it be reported favorably from the Committee on Commerce. It is a bridge bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

RAILROAD DISCRIMINATIONS AND MONOPOLIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have signed the joint resolution "instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil, and report on the same from time to time." I have signed it with hesitation, because in the form in which it was passed it achieves very little and may achieve nothing, and it is highly undesirable that a resolution of this kind shall become law in such form as to give the impression of insincerity—that is, of pretending to do something which really is not done. But after much hesitation I concluded to sign the resolution, because its defects can be remedied by legislation, which I hereby ask for; and it must be understood that unless this subsequent legislation is granted the present resolution must be mainly, and may be entirely, inoperative.

Before specifying what this legislation is, I wish to call attention to one or two preliminary facts. In the first place, a part of the investigation requested by the House of Representatives in the resolution adopted February 15, 1905, relating to the oil industry, and a further part having to do with the anthracite coal industry has been for some time under investigation by the Department of Commerce and Labor. These investigations, I am informed, are approaching completion, and before Congress adjourns I shall submit to you the preliminary reports of these investigations. Until these reports are completed the Interstate Commerce Commission could not endeavor to carry out so much of the resolution of Congress as refers to the ground thus already covered without running the risk of seeing the two investigations conflict, and therefore render each other more or less nugatory. In the second place, I call your attention to the fact that if an investigation of the nature proposed in this joint resolution is thoroughly and effectively conducted, it will result in giving immunity from criminal prosecution to all persons who are called, sworn, and constrained by compulsory process of law to testify as witnesses, though of course such immunity from prosecution is not given to those from whom statements or information merely, in contradistinction to sworn testimony, is obtained. That is not at all to say that such investigations should not be undertaken. Publicity can by itself often accomplish extraordinary results for good, and the court of public judgment may secure such results where the courts of law are powerless. There are many cases where an investigation securing complete publicity about abuses and giving Congress the material on which to proceed in the enactment of laws is more useful than a criminal prosecution can possibly be; but it should not be provided for by law without a clear understanding that it may be an alternative instead of an additional remedy—that is, that to carry on the investigation may serve as a bar to the successful prosecution of the offenses disclosed. The official body directed by Congress to make the investigation must, of course, carry out its direction, and therefore the direction should not be given without full appreciation of what it means.

But the direction contained in the joint resolution which I have signed will remain almost inoperative unless money is provided to carry out the investigations in question, and unless the Commission in carrying them out is authorized to administer oaths and compel the attendance of witnesses. As the resolution now is, the Commission, which is very busy with its legitimate work and which has no extra money at its disposal, would be able to make the investigation only in the most partial and unsatisfactory manner, and, moreover, it is questionable whether it could, under this resolution, administer oaths at all or compel the attendance of witnesses. If this power were disputed by the parties investigated, the investigation would be held up for a year or two until the courts passed upon it, in which case, during the period of waiting, the Commission could only investigate to the extent and in the manner already provided under its organic law, so that the passage of the resolution would have achieved no good result whatever.

I accordingly recommend to Congress the serious consideration of just what they wish the Commission to do and how far they wish it to go, having in view the possible incompatibility of conducting an investigation like this and of also proceeding criminally in a court of law, and, furthermore, that a sufficient sum, say $50,000, be at once added to the current appropriation for the Commission so as to enable them to do the work indicated in a thorough and complete manner, while at the same time the power is explicitly conferred upon them to administer oaths and compel the attendance of witnesses in making the investigation in question, which covers work quite apart from their usual duties. It seems unwise to require an investigation by a commission and then not to furnish either the full legal power or the money, both of which are necessary to render the investigation effective.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 7, 1906.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask that what is commonly known as the "railroad rate bill" be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by its title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the subject that has been uppermost in the minds of the masses of the people of this country for some time has been this great question of railroad rate legislation. Senators have been criticised for not promptly concurring and passing some kind of a rate bill without giving it careful and mature deliberation. I believe that it is the desire of every member of this body to enact a law that will be for the greatest good to the greatest number of people, and in order to accomplish that I feel it is the duty of every man to give this question careful investigation and conscientious thought. And in line with this belief I have, since last October, given as much careful study to this question as it is possible for me with my limited capacity to do. That there are railroad evils to be remedied, I for one shall not deny. That many complaints made against these corporations are just, I shall not gainsay. As a consequence we have had before this body, as well as the House of Representatives, many measures presenting as many methods of relief. Of these I shall not speak. I desire only to address myself to the theory advanced by many reformers—that of government ownership or control. In this connection I want to state that I place under the head of government ownership the control of rates by the Government; for while the two propositions may differ somewhat, it is a difference in degree, not in quality. Neither shall I attempt to discuss the authority of Congress to control in any way the operations of the railroads of this country. I shall content myself with the fact that it has exercised such power in the past, and is now asked to exercise the same power in a greater degree than ever before.

From an intimate relationship with railroads as a shipper for nearly thirty years, I have given this subject my consideration. As a Senator of the United States I have tried to study the subject of government control from the broader standpoint of the roads and all shippers. As a consequence, I am forced to the conclusion, from every standpoint, that the roads are better able to fix rates in accordance with the laws of trade than a government.

As was stated more clearly and more eloquently than I can possibly hope to do by the senior Senator from Massachusetts in his address opening the debate in the Senate on this subject, the working of government ownership of railroads and the control of rates are open to the inspection of all, as both exist. A careful study of the railroad situation in the countries where government control obtains—aye, a superficial examination—will show to anyone the evils resulting from the system and force the belief that governments can not make railway rates that will meet the needs of expanding trade and industry.

The study of railway transportation in this country is the examination into the workings of trade and commerce in the greatest and richest market of the world. It is a review of the history of the last half century of our country, of her marvelous growth, her wonderful transformation and her magnificent prosperity. While the tariff has been the wall which has bounded our land, the railroads have been the means of nearly annihilating space. The tariff furnished the occasion and the railroads cemented the States into one—from a commercial standpoint. And this fact should be borne in mind in determining the influence, the rights, and the future of the railroads. It should not, it must not, be forgotten that the railroads have welded the country into one; that the railroads have made it possible for the products of one section to be the home products of all; that the railroads have been able to stamp out the monstrous doctrine of natural advantage—the advantage of location; that the railroads have with their radiations joined the North, the South, the East, the West into one grand whole of commerce, with a center everywhere.

It would seem that such a benefactor as the railroad has been should be accepted as such and treated as such. But human nature is human nature, the same to-day as it was over one hundred years ago when the Constitution was adopted. The same to-day as it ever has been in all the past, ready to criticise, ready to find fault, ready to cry out. Trading between individuals is the same as trading between communities, as the latter is the same as trading between countries; any difference lies only in amount. In each case the individual, the community, the country seeks the greatest advantage. The loser is the one who objects, who complains, who at last cries out. The force of his outcry depends on the number of voices which echo it, and it may finally lead to serious results. Nor does it matter whether his complaint be founded on justice—if he can complain loud enough others will take up the cry without examining into its merits. So it can easily be seen how a shipper thinking himself unfairly treated by a railroad, a community fearing itself unfairly handled, a locality judging itself discriminated against, may clamor for redress when the general good of all the individuals, of all the communities, of all the localities comprising the country has been best advanced. This is the doctrine of the greatest good for the greatest number, and this doctrine must never be lost sight of in trying to justly serve the people and justly handle the railroads.

The individual and the community or the locality stand for the classes of railroad discrimination which are charged; personal discriminations, the discrimination in favor of localities, and, as a consequence of these two, the fairness of the rates themselves. Of these I desire to speak in their inverse order.

First, as to the reasonableness of rates themselves. No unreasonable rates—that is, rates extortionate of themselves—seem to exist in this country now. There is but little complaint on this point. In the annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1898 this statement is made:

> It is true, as often asserted, that comparatively few of our railway rates are unreasonable in and of themselves—that is, without reference to other charges made by the same carrier, or to those of other carriers. * * * The cases are exceedingly rare in which unreasonableness has been found merely from the amount of the rate itself as laid upon the particular traffic and the distance it was carried.

In March, 1898, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission testified that the question of excessive railroad charges—> that is to say, railroad rates which in and of themselves are extortionate—is pretty much an obsolete question.

It is true, though, that much discussion has arisen concerning the increase in railway freight charges made by the railway companies in the past year or two. And there has been a fear held by many that there is danger lest recent consolidations have raised charges. There is still the further fear that consolidations in the future may finally lead to absolute monopolies and extortionate rates. But this is a subject which belongs to another aspect of the case, and which Congress has taken in hand in other laws which it has passed. The life of commerce in this country, as well as others, must find its very existence in competition. Should railroads by merger attempt to limit competition and thereby lessen the opportunities for commerce, I, for one, would insist on radical action.

Having thus shown that it is the general belief that railroad rates are reasonable, I come to the next point, the charge of the existence of discrimination in rates in favor of localities, and this really is the subject proper. Briefly stated, the question is whether the Government should exercise the power to prescribe railway rates for the purpose of guaranteeing the relative reasonableness of the rates made by the railways leading from rival purchasing and distributing centers to common markets and to rival markets. There is but one way of approaching this question, and that is along the path of experience to the field of results.

Europe being composed of older countries than the United States gives an opportunity of studying the railroad proposition from the standpoint of a populated and developed territory, while the experience of the United States and Australia will show the results from the standpoint of new and developing lands. Naturally the railroads found in Europe a developed commerce.

Highways had been built connecting cities, over which the local traffic of that part of the world was largely carried. The rivers were made use of, and thus commerce was carried between various cities and various commercial and trading centers. From necessity "natural advantage"—the advantage of location—was the basis of supremacy. The city which had a seaport or a water communication of some kind was favored above all others. It became the home of the trader and the shipper; it was the point of concentration from which the highways led into the interior and to less fortunately situated cities and towns. From the beginning the railroads were forced to make low rates to towns with water transportation in order to meet the water competition. To interior points, which before this had been reached only by the public highways, higher rates were made, and as a consequence there was a public outcry against discrimination. Various local interests, which were fighting each other for local supremacy, held that the only remedy for the discrimination complained of was government ownership of the railroads, and Prussia, in 1879, took the first step toward this end. In a short time all the private railroads of the German Empire were bought by the Government and the experiment of a government making rates was begun on a fixed scheme of charges which imposed a terminal charge for loading and unloading, combined with a haulage charge of a fixed sum per ton-mile; and in no country has the system been carried to such an extent, tested in every way.

For example, upon raw materials there is a terminal charge plus haulage charge of nine-tenths of a cent per ton-mile for distances up to 62½ miles, and a trifle over three-fourths of a cent for every mile beyond that limit. By this system of distance rates Germany was not only to solve the discrimination problem, but at the same time was to develop each section of the Empire and decentralize the trade of the country. The centralization of trade was one of the complaints made by the public at large—that is, that the trade of the country was centered in a few cities. By a distance or mileage rate scheme each town would have its own rate, which was to be fair and only for the distance hauled. In this manner the large and strong cities were to give up some of their trade and population, and the interior of the Empire was to be developed. It is my purpose to show briefly whether this result has been obtained.

Broadly speaking, after twenty-five years of experiment and trial, the situation in Germany as regards discrimination and the centralization of trade and commerce has changed only for the worse. The scheme has been a failure; commerce and trade have more effectually been centered in certain favored cities than ever before and discrimination has been increased instead of decreased. Sectional interests and trade interests are at swords' points concerning the preservation of established trade and industry, and use any means to prevent that increase of competition between rival purchasing and distributing centers, which was inevitably good with the development of long-distance traffic. Railroad rates are in politics. No great State measure in the German Empire can be carried through without a coalition of discordant interests on the railroad question. So bitter is the feeling, so intense the rivalry, that the German Government has been forced to go into the canal-building business on a most extensive scale; has been forced to grant export bounty duties, levy import duties, and in every way possible try to placate diverging and sectional interests. Virtually, freight or traffic barriers have been built around section after section of that Empire, until each section stands to-day by itself, fighting for commercial interests.

As an illustration of the centralization of trade, the iron and steel business can be taken. The Rhur district and the Saar district produce, respectively, 39 and 36 per cent of the pig-iron product in Germany. In a word, they are iron producers of equal importance. Yet, so far as trade depends on railways, the Saar district is almost shut out from northern, central, and eastern Germany, while, on the other hand, it has practically a monopoly of the iron and steel trade with southern German and Switzerland. The reverse is true of the province of Silesia, which has a monopoly of the trade of that province, parts of east Prussia, and the foreign territory lying immediately to the east of Silesia.

In this way the iron and steel trade of Germany is apportioned to these three producing and distributing centers. Many efforts have been made to have the railway rates lowered between these great producing centers, but they have been unsuccessful. The Government has claimed that a reduction in rates given to one interest or locality must be followed by counterbalancing reductions to others. As a result of this refusal to lower transportation charges and the inability of these three districts to interchange ores it is estimated by one of the foremost authorities of the German iron and steel industries that the transportation charges constitute 28 per cent of the total cost of iron making in that Empire, as against 10 per cent in Great Britain, Germany's principal competitor. This same condition applies to the traffic in all other bulky and comparatively low-priced articles of trade, and has done much to make more sectional than ever the sections of Germany.

Then, too, the effect of the mileage rate on cities is shown in the example of Bremen and Stettin. Prior to 1877, under the private ownership of railroads, Bremen had a virtual monopoly of supplying Germany with petroleum imported from the United States, but now, owing to the cheap water transportation, Hamburg has captured all that trade and the railroad department is powerless with its inelastic rates, and Bremen must suffer. Bremen is as near the center of the beet-sugar industry as Hamburg, but it has practically no export sugar trade, because the railroad is powerless to aid in meeting the rates of the river vessels. Stettin is the only Prussian port of importance, and it has of late years been losing trade to Hamburg, and the Government is powerless to keep up the business of its one port by reduced freight charges. But it seeks to remedy this condition by the building of canals at an immense expense, and this is the only remedy that Germany has found for its present vexatious problem of freight transportation and the centralizing of trade in a few cities. This agency may be, and is, a greater evil than those complained of under the private ownership of railroads, for it has increased local jealousies and made discriminations in favor of cities and districts more positive than ever shown by a private railroad. And as these rivers are deepened and the canals widened to float larger vessels the discrimination in favor of the cities and the districts reached becomes more marked and more cruel.

It might be interesting for a moment to glance at the condition of the railway properties of Germany from an effective standpoint. They have not advanced in capacity to handle trade, in roadbed, or in any other way in which the modern railroads of America have grown to be such marvels of mechanical genius. So it is not strange that the State railroads of Germany have done little toward helping that country to adjust itself to the general world-wide fall of prices. Professor Meyer, in his work on railway rates, states, on German and American authority, that in Germany for the entire period of 1880 to 1899 prices fell 17.6 per cent and railway charges 14.7 per cent. In the United States, however, prices fell 24.3 per cent and railway charges 41.7 per cent.

It is true that in the matter of personal discrimination the German Government has been fairly successful in limiting it upon railways. Indeed, in the American sense of the term there is no personal discrimination effected by means of secret rates. But the Government found upon taking charge of the private railways that certain commodities were given a special or preferential rate, and it has increased these to such an extent that it is estimated that 80 per cent of the freight of the Empire is carried by these rates.

This brief review of the situation in Germany shows that the government ownership of railroads and the government making of railroad rates has failed in the two most important features—the decentralizing of trade and the abolishing of discrimination. In a word, we find that the commercial freedom of trade intercourse within the borders of the German Empire is far from what it would have been had the making of railroad rates been based upon the economic principles of the demands of trade.

A similar condition exists in Austria-Hungary; and in Austria-Hungary and the Danubian provinces local jealousies and local rates have made it almost impossible for the products of these countries to compete anywhere. So it is in Russia. The great Siberian region could be opened up, as was the great West of this country, for wheat growing. The wheat growers of Siberia would use the manufactured articles of southern Russia; but the wheat growers of Russia whose lands lie between Siberia and the Baltic or Black Sea object on the ground of nearness to markets; as a result there is but little wheat grown in Siberia. In Russia, as in Germany, hard and fast rates have driven transportation to the waterways, and thus increased the discrimination in favor of natural locations.

Australia shows a different aspect. There the several railways compete on a mileage rate for the traffic of the great wool-producing center of Australia—the Riverina. It would be an easy matter for the railway managers to agree upon a division of the Riverina, but the government will not permit it; as a consequence the trade and commerce of the government of Australia centers in the three towns of Melbourne, Sydney, and Adelaide. There are no small basing or distributing centers scattered throughout the country. For example, when the railroads of Victoria were extended to Ballarat, 100 miles in the interior, that town had a considerable wholesale trade, but this was lost on the mileage-distance scheme when the railroad was farther extended. As a consequence there is an extraordinary concentration of the people of Australia in a few cities, and these cities make the laws of a country whose resources are mainly agricultural and pastoral. But a more comprehensive review of the entire situation is found in an interview given by Gen. H. C. Corbin, of our Army, published in the Army and Navy Journal of February 24, 1906. He had just returned from a trip to New Zealand and Australia, and in speaking of the former country, said:

> The government owns all the railroads, life and fire insurance, telephone, as well as telegraph lines; savings banks are the property of the government; yet the railroad rates and fares are much greater than in the United States. This is also true in Australia, where all the railroads are owned and operated by the state. In neither is the service anything like as good as at home.

Having thus briefly outlined the situation as my investigation has led me to find it in Europe and Australia, I come to the situation in the United States, where there has been full sway to competition of commercial forces. What is the result? The most expeditious and efficient system of railroad transportation of any nation of the earth; a system that has a mileage which has increased from 76,808 miles in 1876 to 217,250 miles on January 1, 1906—an increase of 182 per cent; a system that in 1882 carried 360,490,375 tons of freight and in 1904 carried 1,275,321,607—an increase of 254 per cent; a system that as a result of improvement in railway equipment, etc., is vastly more efficient than that of even twenty years ago; a system that has decreased the average rate for carrying freight from 1.24 cents per ton-mile in 1882 to 0.77 of a cent per ton-mile in 1904—a cut of 38 per cent; a system which has decreased the rate per ton charge from 1887 to 1905 24 per cent. Compared with the experience of Germany this should, in my opinion, settle forever the result of government rate making. It will be proper, however, and perhaps enlightening to study somewhat in detail the conditions which have produced these results.

The civil war left the various industries of the United States in a most unsettled condition. The great wave of immigration from 1867 to 1873 and the great panic of the latter year led to a most wonderful change of population and most remarkable migration to the cheap farming lands of the West. The great grain-growing and wheat-raising States west of Pennsylvania increased their area under corn and wheat by 39,000,000 acres—the equivalent of 70 per cent of the increase of the area under crops of all kinds in the United States. At once the economic conditions of the country were faced with the problem of consuming the wheat that was being raised in this wonderful new development of the West. So far did this great American granary lie from the Atlantic seaboard that it was held that the distance alone would preclude its exportation to Europe. More wheat was being raised than could be consumed in the East, and nothing but ruin stared the western farmer, the eastern farmer, and the eastern manufacturer in the face. But the competition of the railroads, competition based on the demands of trade and not on the hard and fast lines of a government mileage rate, solved this problem.

In the development of this great western section people and localities suffered, but the progress went on—the greatest good for the greatest number. The courts were hampered with petitions that the rates on grain be fixed on a mileage basis, since any other adjustment of rates destroyed the advantage of proximity to market. The protestants failed to appreciate that the commerce of the United States was growing outside of State limits, that the manufacturers of the Eastern States would have a market in the great West for their products, and that the whole was being far advanced. Judging from European experience, which I have tried to point out, had they been successful the buffalo to-day might still be roaming through the wild grass of the West, and the trade of this country centered in a few cities of natural location.

This development was brought about by discrimination, or, in other words, by the demands of trade. As late as 1868 the Erie Canal dominated the grain situation and directed the bulk of this traffic to New York City. By 1874 the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio railroads had reached Chicago and commenced a series of rate wars with the New York Central to secure to each of them a share on the shipments of grain to Europe. But the ocean freights between Philadelphia and Baltimore and Europe were necessarily higher than the ocean freights between New York and Europe, therefore the railway charges between Philadelphia and Baltimore and the interior had to be, and still must be, lower than the railway charges between New York and the interior. These two roads were finally successful in securing a differential which enabled them to handle grain in competition with New York. That arrangement did not suit New York then, and does not suit her now. She claims the right of natural advantage, has petitioned Congress time after time, and has been opposed to the differential ever since. On a hard and fast system of mileage rate—such rates as Germany has—New York would to-day handle the bulk of the grain trade.

Consequent upon this rate war is another illustration of the benefit of competition based upon the demands of trade. In 1870 the interior cities of the country solicited Congress to authorize the transportation of imported goods in bond from the Atlantic ports to Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Memphis, and other cities. The railroads were able to haul these goods at moderate rates, since they gave an opportunity to load the empty cars which had carried the grain east. As a result of favorable action by Congress, these interior cities began a career as distributing points and captured a great part of the jobbing trade that had formerly gone to the larger Atlantic cities. This system aided in the inevitable result of the growth of population and wealth in the interior. The jobbing trade of the Atlantic cities was not satisfied with this competition and complained. It is not satisfied with it to-day, but the greatest good to the greatest number has been obtained.

This competition which has built up this great western territory in every case protects each section. There are ten great concentrating grain markets from which radiate roads in all directions. The traffic is watched from day to day and a rate war is the final arbitrator of differences that can not otherwise be settled. So in every case the rates are a compromise between rival interests. As a compromise they perhaps please no one, but they are for the general good, and are the result of free, unhampered trade competition.

I desire, Mr. President, at some little length to call attention to the study of one more of the discriminations of the railroads which has decentralized trade in this country and established distributing points of importance all over the land—the basing-point system. This is a system which the long and short haul of the interstate-commerce act was, in the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to do away with. The Commission itself admits that the system has been a material benefit in some cases. (Holdskom v. Michigan Central Railroad Company et al.) It admitted that the system resulted in cheaper prices for the people, and that no near-by city was injured, but yet it holds that it is not right. That the system has decentralized trade is further shown by the action of several State railroad commissions, all bearing testimony to this effect.

My attention was called a few days ago to an article in the Review of Reviews, written by Mr. D. K. Redmonds, editor of the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record, showing the astonishing growth and development of the South. I desire to use a few of his figures to illustrate the point I am now discussing. Between 1880 and 1905 the South increased the number of its cotton spindles from 667,000 to 9,205,000 and the consumption of cotton in its mills from 225,000 to 2,163,000 bales. To appreciate these figures it must be remembered that New England and all the country outside of the South in 1880 consumed 1,350,000 bales, or six times as much as the South, and in 1905, 2,282,900 bales, or but a few thousand bales more than the South. In its 777 mills the South has $225,000,000 invested, and the room for the expansion of this industry is limited only by the South's inability to supply labor and capital. Of her coal and iron developments the mind of man can scarcely grasp the full conception. The South has a total of 62,957 square miles of rich coal lands against a combined total for Great Britain and Germany of 12,600 square miles. In timber also the wealth of the South is fabulous and practically untouched, and on top of all comes the South's agricultural productions, with a total value of $1,750,000,000, of which cotton furnished about $600,000,000. It includes also 496,000,000 pounds of tobacco and 2,500,000 barrels of sugar.

All this great development, Mr. President, has been accomplished by the aid of the basing system, which results from the competition between the railways themselves, between the railways and the coast vessels, and between the railways and the river steamers. I can not do better at this point than to reproduce the description of the method of the adjustment of rates under this basing system made before the Industrial Commission by Mr. M. C. Markham, assistant traffic manager of the Illinois Central Railroad. Mr. Markham stated that the Mississippi River fixed the rates between New Orleans and St. Louis. He then added that while Mobile, situated 140 miles east of the Mississippi River, had not the competition of a river to force down railroad rates it had railroads which were interested in enabling Mobile merchants and manufactureres to compete in common markets with the merchants and manufacturers of New Orleans. One hundred and eighty miles farther to the northeast lie Montgomery and Selma, trade centers on the Alabama River.

The railroads reaching Montgomery and Selma had no interest in New Orleans or Mobile, and tried to get all the traffic they could to and from Montgomery and Selma by putting these towns on a fair plane respecting rates with Mobile and New Orleans. Still farther inland lie Meridian and Jackson, Miss., Birmingham and Gadsden, Ala., and Chattanooga, Tenn., on the one side, and Columbus, Rome, Atlanta, Athens, Macon, and Augusta, Ga., and other towns of importance, on the other side, all asking of the railroads which served them such rates as would enable them to do business in common territory in competition with New Orleans, Mobile, Montgomery, and Selma, as well as in competition with one another.

In the same way Galveston, 360 miles west of New Orleans, had no river advantages, but the railroads serving it enabled its merchants and manufacturers to compete in northern common markets with New Orleans merchants and manufacturers. The adjustment of rates the Galveston roads had to make for that purpose ultimately was extended to the outlying and intermediate towns between Galveston and the Missouri River and between Galveston and the Mississippi River north of Vicksburg, all of which had to have the concessions which the forces of trade warranted.

Finally, the low rates made by the railways from St. Louis to Memphis and New Orleans on account of the Mississippi River had to be met by the railroads from Chicago, Cincinnati, and many other points, in order to enable the industries of the last-named cities to hold their own with the industries of St. Louis. In this way, said Mr. Markham, the low rates which were made in the first instance to meet the competition of the Mississippi River finally were extended, wholly or in part, to the entire northern, southern, and southwestern portions of the United States.

It must be plain to every hearer that the consumer was finally the man who profited, for by this working of competition it is the consumer who gained by this vast basing system.

In addition to decentralizing trade, and in that way building up various wholesale interests all over the country, the principle of making low rates to competitive points has been a great economy in the interest of transportation. Freight that moves in large quantities and at regular intervals is handled much more cheaply than freight which comes in small and intermittent quantities. Were there no basing points freight would have to be carried over long distances from the source of supply in comparatively small and irregularly flowing quantities. The establishment of these basing points has made the railroads of the United States what they are to-day. To meet the efforts of their rivals, roads have been forced into large expenditures for the betterment of their lines, in their rolling stock, and all other things relative thereto. With rates fixed to competitive points and on a low basis the Baltimore and Ohio road, for instance, has been forced within the past five or six years to enter into a most expensive system of roadbed, straightening out curves, the laying of heavier rails, the purchase of greater power locomotives and heavy rolling stock.

And the example of the Baltimore and Ohio is only an illustration of what other roads have done. Had not the railroads of this country been permitted to avail themselves of the economies of the basing-point system their growth would have been much slower. To illustrate this point further, a glance at the Australian system will aid. There, as I have shown before, there is no basing-point system. In 1902 the average train load in New South Wales was 66 tons and in South Australia 69 tons. Such loads mean high running expenses, and are ridiculous when compared with the hauling capacity of a modern American railroad.

It is unnecessary to illustrate this system further. The story of the distribution over the West of the merchandise and manufactures of the East is only a story of the basing-point system of the South. The railways pursued the same course in the West as in the South; they developed first the most promising resources, and then turned to the least promising. Thus they discriminated. But in all cases the railways were operated with the one point in view—of making a profitable investment—and to do this they were forced to cooperate with the American people, promoting their immediate as well as their permanent interests. They did not go contrary to the interests of the people. The policy of the railways in making rates was not governed by a fixed rule, such as the mileage tariff, and the rates were made as cases arose, so as to meet the demand of the occasion, and they manifested then, as now, one overruling principle, the development of industry and trade wherever such development was practicable. In this way they have made the United States a great commercial whole.

In regard to the third class of discrimination charged, that of personal discrimination, it is necessary to say but little. Discrimination between individuals apart from competition—that is, giving to one man or one interest a rate for the sole purpose of favoring the business of that man, or injuring the business of another man or another interest—scarcely exists in this country. The Interstate Commerce Commission says it does not exist. No proceeding is pending now, or has been pending, upon any such charge, though it is an offense under the interstate-commerce act. The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission has testified, under oath, that there has never been brought to his knowledge a rate made in bad faith—that is, for the sole motive of helping one man's business and hurting another. Rebates, general tariffs with short terminal lines, and dealings with refrigerator and other car lines are another matter. While for convenience they may be classed under the general head of personal discrimination, they stand upon a really different basis. Rebates are a method of cutting the published rate, the result of competition.

A shipper has a large amount of freight to be carried, several competing railroads want the business, none of the companies can openly change their published rate, but one of them can secure the business, and at the end of the month, or in the regular course of business, send a check to the shipper for a reduction agreed upon by each of them. This is forbidden by the interstate-commerce act; it is a kind of competition which is very dangerous and ought not to be allowed. I can appreciate the desire of a railroad company to give the man who ships 1,000 tons of freight a month a better rate than the one who ships only 100 tons; but it is wrong; it is dangerous, and I will gladly join in any effort that will stamp it out.

But there is also another evil under the head of "personal discrimination," which has come to light within the past few years, and that is a discrimination in favor of handling one shipper's product at the expense of another; the refusal of a railroad company to carry at all the product of a certain shipper. This, to me, Mr. President, is one of the worst evils of railroad management to-day; is one which should be met and dealt with most severely; is one that should be eradicated, stamped out, even if the most stringent measures are necessary to accomplish this end. The railroad, as a common carrier, must and ought of right give to each shipper his fair share of the facilities the road has to offer for the advancement of commerce. I may digress here for a moment to speak of the great coal interests of the country, and to express my belief that it is a most dangerous course for a railroad to pursue, to be found as the owner of, or participating in the profits of, any great tract of coal lands. This I would hold true with any of the other great necessities of life, and believe that the railroad in the future, as in the past, should devote itself entirely to its duties as a public carrier.

The problem of rate making is the problem of commerce; is the problem of compromising the daily struggles going on between the different trade centers of the country. It extends further than to the mere settlement of the price to be charged by one railway in carrying a ton of freight; it enters into the very essence of our happiness and prosperity as a country. The more it is studied the more complicated the problem seems to be, and the more sure I am that the rate-making power is safer in the hands of the railroads than it is in any body of men appointed for that purpose.

I have tried to show the evils of rate making by Government ownership and by Government control. The invariable result in those countries where such system exists has been to transfer the field of business to the field of politics, with disastrous results. Under the Government ownership of railways in Germany the state railway department is not allowed to make a railway rate that will permit the surplus product of one section to compete in another section of the country. It has been forced to expend immense amounts of money to build canals to assist certain sections. It has hampered its own industries and has fostered jealousies. In Russia the same paralysis of the railways exist through trade jealousies with the resulting recourse to transportation by river. In Australia trade jealousies force each colony to refuse to cooperate with its neighbor. And in England and France almost the same condition exists.

On the other hand, the example furnished by the United States speaks more eloquently than any words I can use, of the beneficial results of railroad rates based on the requirements of the economies of trade. I have pointed out the benefits of the basing-point system and of the free play of competition. I have shown how trade has been decentralized and the whole country welded into one great commercial whole. I have tried to show that the railroads by their virtual annihilation of space have made this result possible, and I can see, for myself, no reason why we should change.

But it may be claimed that no measure now before this body would place the rate-making power on a system which would follow so obvious a commercial failure as that off European governments. In reply, I can only say that we must judge of what will be done by what has been done. In 1887 the Interstate Commerce Commission was established for the avowed purpose of regulating trade, doing away with discriminations and the many other faults complained of by certain interests in the United States. Since that time they have had many cases before them, and seemingly from the start laid down as a basic principle that railway rates may not be adjusted to each other on commercial considerations, but that such adjustments must conform strictly to differences in the cost of the service for which the respective rates were made, in other words, that there must be a mileage tariff.

These cases have been all appealed to the Supreme Court and the basic principles laid down by the Interstate Commerce Commission in nearly every case have been overruled. The Interstate Commerce Commission held that competition by waterway was the only commercial consideration that should be taken account of in making a competing rate to a competing point. They have repeatedly condemned the great American rate practices, by which the various sections of the country have been built up into one great whole, without seemingly studying the various conditions that have caused the establishment of such rates. They have held that a rate principle might be unlawful though no location or community could say that they were injured by it. No rate principle was right that was not based on a mileage tariff. The Interstate Commerce Commission has construed the act to regulate commerce on this mileage-tariff plan. It has construed the phrase "under substantially similar conditions and circumstances" to mean but one thing—a mileage tariff.

For instance, in 1893 the Interstate Commerce Commission held that rates made by certain railroads to Troy, Ala., were relatively unjust when compared with those to Montgomery, Ala., attacking the basing-rate system, the benefits of which I have tried to illustrate at some length. The Commission held that the conditions were similar at Montgomery, Ala., to those at Troy, and held that the fact that Montgomery was situated upon a navigable stream did not of itself justify the lesser charge for the longer haul. The Supreme Court, however, in reversing the decision of the Commissioners took into account the fact that the volume of population and business at Montgomery is many times larger than it is at Troy, and that there were more railroad lines running to and from Montgomery connecting with distant markets; that the Alabama River was open all the year, and was capable of bearing to Mobile, on the sea, the burden of all the goods of every class that passed to and from Montgomery. It took all these matters into consideration and decided that the railroads, subject to the two leading prohibitions, that their charges shall not be unjust or unreasonable—> are better qualified to act in such cases than is any commission or board of public administration, and, within the limits suggested, it is safe and wise to leave to their managers the adjusting of dissimilar circumstances and the conditions to their business.

Another doctrine developed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is that no place may be deprived of the advantages accruing to it by reason of its geographical situation. The monstrousness of this doctrine can readily be seen; and it is on the opposite of this that the railroad systems of this country have based their rates for the past forty years. The result of "the natural-advantage" doctrine has been shown in the railroad history of Europe and Australia. The advantage of the annihilating of space, the building of this country into one, with its basing centers, and its sections brought into close connection, has been shown in the wonderful growth and development of this land since the civil war.

So, Mr. President, judging from the past, I am led to the conclusion that the Interstate Commerce Commission would, if it had the power, establish at once the principles of the mileage tariff and of natural location. Therefore I can not agree that a political commission appointed by a President, open to change at every general election, should have the power to fix railroad rates on any such theories. Neither do I think, Mr. President, that the country wants such a system of rate making, for I do not think that rate making is the remedy for the evils which exist. That there are evils I have tried to point out, and I believe that it is the duty of Congress to eradicate them; to make it plain that the railroads must be public carriers, free to all; that one man's product must be hauled as rapidly and freely as another; that there must be no rebates, no personal discriminations, no ownership of the great necessities of life. These are evils that are to be met and remedied. The small operator, the small business man, must have the right of having his product expeditiously and freely handled. In my own State a case of a railroad refusing to make a switch connection has been given much publicity. Our own State laws have in similar cases compelled railroads to make these connections.

But to give all the States the benefit of our experience I would have any bill prepared so that it would protect the small operator, whatever his business may be, force railroads to make connections with lateral roads and thus give to all free and unrestricted transportation to all markets. Should the bill now before the Senate pass without amendment, I think the people of the United States within a very few years would find that it remedied none of the evils it was supposed to cure. I want the bill amended so that the coal operator of West Virginia can open up his mine, have that mine connected with a railroad, have his just share of cars, and thus have his product carried to the best market. I want the bill amended so that the farmer of the West can ship his surplus grain; so that the planter of the South can dispose of his cotton, and the lumberman of the North of his timber, and that these in turn can take their share of the manufactures of the East. I want the bill amended so that it will be plain that the railroads shall not be owners of coal lands, grain lands, or any business enterprises, and that the small producer shall have an equal chance with the large.

In trying to treat fairly and justly the railroads, as well as the people, we must bear in mind that the railroad growth of the last half century has been reached only through enormous expenditures of money. The railroads have spanned a wilderness, with no immediate financial returns in prospect, and the wilderness has blossomed as the rose. The railroads climbed through the mountains and hills of West Virginia at a great expense and waited long before the development of her mineral resources startled the world. In most instances the railroads have been built as business enterprises, entered into from purely business motives. Their success has always been identical with the growth of the country. So, Mr. President, we should strive to correct the evils which do exist.

So along the lines of correcting the evils I have pointed out I think the Interstate Commerce Commission could properly work. I also believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission may judge of the unjustness of certain rates, but it should bear in mind that the railroads are not all bad, and its conclusions should be based on the free competition of all trade economies, not on a mileage scheme or a scheme of natural location. I do not want to see railroad rates the general political question of this country. I do not want to see Congress arrayed into sections trading with each other for some seeming advantage. I do not want to see the great commerce of this country centered in a few cities favorably located on natural waterways.

I want to secure to the greatest number the greatest good, and this can be done, in my opinion, better by trained railroad men who have made this question of rates a lifetime study, and acting under the restrictions proposed before, than by any commission.

I realize, however, that there is a demand that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given authority in the matter, and that power will probably be given it to fix rates when conditions require it. I am opposed to giving them that power, certainly without a provision for a broad and general court revision, to which the shipper and carrier can appeal when the rate designated is unfair to either. I hold to such a revision by the court since the history of the Interstate Commerce Commission has shown to my mind that the power of the court to review their decisions has simply saved this country from the experience of European countries. That experience has shown that discriminations of a more serious nature than we have exist, and prove conclusively that the results coming to us, had the Interstate Commerce Commission the powers to enforce its decisions, would have been disastrous beyond comparison.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in addressing myself to the pending bill, I shall try to trespass but a little time upon the patience of the Senate and shall endeavor to present in a plain and practical way the issues involved in the pending legislation.

In my humble judgment the day of the academic discussion of this question is past, and we stand now face to face with a practical question, involving also the legal aspect of this controversy as involved in the pending bill. To hear some men talk and to read some articles that are printed from day to day in the magazines, to read the pamphlets that are piled upon our desks in our committee rooms, one would be led to think that the American Republic, for the first time in its history, stood face to face with the problem of rate regulation. Such is not the case.

In 1887 the Federal Government became in a formal and decisive manner committed to the policy of rate regulation, and the question to-day is not what might be done, not what the imagination may conjure up as the possibilities resulting from regulation, but the question is, What is the best plan to pursue in carrying out that policy which we adopted in 1887? If we stood at the threshold of attempted regulation, much of the matter published to-day, while it might be of little value, might perhaps be pertinent; but for nineteen years the Government has been committed to the policy and purpose of regulation, and the wisdom of this policy was frankly admitted by almost every witness who came before our committee last spring. And with nineteen years of experience the real question now is, How can we best perfect the existing law?

The present tentative plan is embraced in the pending bill reported by the committee, and my remarks will be limited at this time to discussing some of the objections urged to the legality of the bill.

Let me say that in presenting these issues I shall try to confine myself to the use of plain terms so far as possible in the discussion of legal propositions, and shall refrain from indulging in any denunciation, for, to my mind, no reason exists why we should not approach the consideration of this question with that same calm deliberation, with that same purpose to serve the interests of the American people, so far as those interests can be served by legislation, which ought to characterize us in the consideration of any other proposed legislation.

I shall waste no time to-day in discussing the primary proposition of the power of Congress to engage in and continue this policy of rate regulation. If there is any one question which, it seems to me, is settled beyond dispute, it is that Congress can regulate interstate commerce, and in that act can employ the agency of a commission. In 1874 this question first began to arise in the efforts of the States to regulate intrastate commerce, and since that time numerous cases have come before the Supreme Court, and there is an unbroken series of adjudications of that court sustaining the power of the States thus to regulate intrastate commerce, and to do it through the agency or the medium of a railroad commission.

Great judges, like Waite, Field, Brewer, and others, have reiterated that this power exists in the States. I shall content myself with one quotation from Justice Brewer in the Reagan case (154 U. S., 362):

> Passing from the question of jurisdiction to the act itself, there can be no doubt of the general power of a State to regulate the fares and freights which may be charged and received by railroad or other carriers, and that this regulation can be carried on by means of a commission. Such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislation.

These cases having arisen under State constitutions it is claimed they afford no authority for the exercise of this plan by Congress under the Federal Constitution. It will be noticed the same division of powers exists in the Federal Government as exist in the State governments, and the repeated affirmation by the Supreme Court of the power of the legislature to employ the agency of a commission. The statement of Justice Brown that such a commission is merely an adminstrative board created to carry out the will of the State as expressed by the legislature is as applicable to Federal as to State.

At the outset we insist that while the Federal Government is a Government of delegated powers, while the powers of Congress are those named in the Constitution, yet as absolutely essential to sovereignty the Federal courts long years ago declared that in those powers which are granted to Congress the power of Congress is plenary, the limitation to be found only in the Constitution itself. This has been iterated and reiterated until finally, in the Northern Securities case (193 U. S., 197), the court declared that the power of Congress over those matters which were the subject of Congressional legislation was as absolute as it would have been in the States which formed the Union or in the Parliament of England. Now, if this is true, then it would follow as a logical sequence that Congress possesses as absolute power in this respect over interstate commerce as the legislature of the State would possess with reference to State commerce or interstate commerce.

But we do not have to depend upon the logic of the situation, for in 1897 the Supreme Court, considering the interstate-commerce act now in force, declared that there were two ways in which Congress could regulate the question of transportation. One way was to enact a schedule. The other was to employ a commission for the purpose of ascertaining what would be reasonable rates and determining what rates were unreasonable. (Maximum Rate case, 167 U. S., 479.)

In 1887 the interstate-commerce law was passed, and at the very threshold of this inquiry to-day it seems to me we should consider what are the proposed changes contemplated by the bill under consideration. We have been told here this morning in effect that the proposed legislation would enable the Commission to reduce transportation rates to a mileage basis; that it would result in that confusion which flows from the governmental ownership of railroads, or, as it has been characterized here as an equivalent, the governmental regulation of railroad rates. There is not a line in the law as it exists to-day which enables the Commission to reduce rates to a mileage basis, and the men who have been instrumental in framing this proposed legislation, recognizing the importance of the interchange of commodities through this great country of ours, breaking down sectionalism, making the people one united whole, have carefully guarded it so that there is not one line in the proposed legislation which would enable the Commission to reduce rates to a mileage basis.

We were told the other day by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that one constitutional objection to the proposed law was that it would violate that provision of the Constitution which guarantees the ports of the respective States as against favoritism or preferential legislation at the hands of Congress. There is not one line in the proposed legislation which changes the law so far as preferential or differential rates are concerned.

What is the proposed change? The proposed change, Mr. President, in addition to dealing with private cars and kindred service, is simply this: In 1897 the Supreme Court held that while the Commission had the legal authority to condemn an existing rate, they had no legal authority to name the new rate. And what has been the experience since then? Namely, that lacking the legal right to name the new rate, the Commission has practically been obliged to make rates through the agency of a club in the nature of a threat held over the carrier. This was the logical sequence. If the Commission condemned a rate of $1 and suggested a rate of 80 cents, that suggestion was significant in the fact that if the carrier did not adopt the 80-cent rate the Commission could then challenge the new rate, and the result has been, as shown by the testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee last summer, that in the great majority of cases the carrier has been obliged to or at least has adopted the suggestion of the Commission as to the new rate.

Now the difficulty with the existing law is right here. What the American public, both the shipper and the carrier, need is certainty in law and promptness in the establishment of the things sought to be secured by the law. That is the weak point in the existing law as to the question of fixing rates. While the Commission can condemn the existing rate, they have no legal authority to name the new rate; and this bill proposes to make that change and to give them the same and no more and no greater power—it proposes to give them the same legal authority to name the new rate which they have to condemn the existing rate.

I want to say—and I say it in the sense of a challenge to criticism and analysis—that there is not a single condition relating to and growing out of the change of rates that does not attach as absolutely to a change of rate under existing law as it would if the Commission was authorized directly to name the new rate.

We have been told from time to time, both in the Senate and out of the Senate, that if this law passes and the Commission makes a new rate, that new rate will involve the adjustment of all correlated rates. That is true; but if there is a rate of $1 to-day and the Commission discontinues that rate and forces that rate down 20 cents, that change of 20 cents will just as absolutely affect the revenues of the company, will just as absolutely necessitate the adjustment of correlated rates, will just as absolutely disturb the existing conditions as though that change of 20 cents was made by a direct order fixing the rate at 80 cents.

It seems to me that those who have appeared to be opposed to this proposed legislation have magnified the question in relation to its effect upon the carrier, in relation to its effect upon transportation, in relation to its effect upon existing conditions. It does not depend upon who makes the change nor how the change is made, but it depends upon the change itself.

Now, it is proposed to give this additional power in as plain and certain manner as to expression and administration as possible, and we are met at the very outset by a number of constitutional objections. I shall confine myself principally to answering, as best I may, those which have been made both in the Senate and out of the Senate.

We are told constantly, and have been ever since this matter began to assume a serious form, that the evil in this country is not the question of rates, but it is discrimination and rebates. In 1903 the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, recognizing the evil of discrimination and rebates, passed a law specially designed to reach that evil. It is a little singular that the men who to-day are insisting that the one thing which will bring order out of chaos in the transportation world of America is legislation directed at discrimination and rebates were as silent as the tomb when others were engaged in that work in 1903.

That law was not perfect. That law did not go quite far enough in the matter of securing evidence of violation. But it has been an efficient law, and if that law contained mistakes and errors, I for one am perfectly willing to stand here and assume my share of the responsibility for such mistakes.

It has been said that we made a great mistake in that law in changing the punishment from imprisonment to fine. Mr. President, it is not a question so much of punishment, but, as was termed the other day by the brilliant Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], it is a question of securing conviction. It developed before the committee that many of these offenses, so far as the technical act of offense itself was concerned, would be traced to some office boy at a salary of $1,200 a year, and it would be idle to expect juries or courts to inflict upon him the penalty of the law. So it was thought wise to change it to a fine, so that if a conviction was obtained and a penalty was imposed it would fall on those who primarily were guilty of the offense. If that was a mistake, I am willing to stand here and take my full share of responsibility for it.

But, Mr. President, that law did not reach this question of rates alleged to be primarily high in themselves, and that can only be reached by the pending legislation or some bill of a similar character.

The first serious objection that is made to this bill is that the bill does not itself provide for a trial somewhere in a court of justice. From the foundation of the Government Congress has been passing laws that affect the people. This is the first time in connection with this subject that it has ever been suggested that the law operating to carry into effect the will of the legislature along governmental policies should also be a revision of the code of judicial procedure.

Not only that, but we have gone further. In the exercise of the functions of Government we have created tribunals. We have clothed those tribunals with power to determine those acts necessary to be determined in administering the affairs of the Government, notably when we clothed the Postmaster-General with the power to close the mails against the citizens of this country, notably when we clothed the immigration office in final appeal to the Department of Commerce and Labor with power to close the ports of this country against those who sought our shores if perforce it was claimed that they came within the exclusion clause of the Chinese act.

You may search those laws in vain to find there the suggestion that in the law providing for the administration of the functions of government there should be incorporated a revision of the code of judicial procedure. Those laws operate as a finality, so far as the Government goes, but beyond that those upon whom those laws operate have the same right to appeal to a court of equity which any citizen of this country has.

In order to understand the full scope of a review of the act of the Commission we should look back to the source of this subject and see what it is that it is proposed to review. The relation of the common carrier to the public is a peculiar relation. It differs from an ordinary vocation. If a man should start a store or open a farm, there is no rule of American law that interferes with his getting any price he can for his product. But the peculiar relation which exists between the carrier and the public has developed a rule of law that, while the carrier may charge rates for transportation, that charge must be a reasonable rate. That has been reiterated time and again by the courts of this country.

In fixing a rate we have the undoubted right either by act of Congress direct or through a commission to prescribe a reasonable rate, and down to the point of a reasonable rate it is not the taking of the property of the carrier, because in law the carrier has no right of property above a reasonable rate. In determining that reasonable rate you are simply drawing the line between the property of the carrier on the one hand and the property of the shipper on the other, and it does not involve the taking of private property either without process of law or in violation of the constitutional requirement that it can only be taken on paying just compensation.

It is along that line and within that limit that the Government has so often acted through subordinate agents, leaving the act of the agent under the authority of the law final as to the Government itself. But the moment we step over that line, then we are taking private property, and that moment the guaranty of the Constitution attaches to that property and to the owner of the property.

That being the rule, what is the broad rule of law as to the invasion of that right? The gentlemen who have been principally active in framing this bill framed it upon the theory that no act of Congress can ever take from an American citizen the right to go into a court unburdened save by those trivial burdens that ever attach to litigation and demand at the hands of that court protection under the constitutional guaranty of the right of property.

We went a step further, and went upon the theory that no act of Congress can enlarge that power, because the enlarging of that power and the exercise of that power involve the constitutional right of the other side to the controversy, and his right can not be impaired any more than the right of a common carrier. In other words, we can not enlarge or take from an American citizen the right to go into a court of equity.

The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], formerly Attorney-General of the United States, laid down this rule with remarkable clearness in a speech delivered at Pittsburg, in which, in speaking of the effect of the order of the Commission going into effect under the law and the effort of the carrier to obtain a restraining order, he used this language:

> Of course I do not mean that in an independent proceeding begun in the court the court could not, in the exercise of its discretionary powers, when satisfied that the rate fixed by the Commission was unlawful, enjoin its operation until a final hearing. That is a power that inheres in the court that need not be conferred by statute and probably can not be taken away by a statute.

If it is in the inherent power of a court of equity to stay the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission by a temporary restraining order, it strikes me, as a logical sequence, that that same court has ample jurisdiction to entertain an inquiry as to whether that order should remain in force or not.

But we do not have to depend upon the logic of this matter either, for the courts have entertained this policy in the cases. Take the cases under the law authorizing the Postmaster-General to close the mails. No provision was made there for review. That act of his, so far as the Government is concerned, is final. There is no suggestion there of an amendment to the code of procedure. But in two cases the court has entertained the plea of the citizen, in one case (McAnnulty case, 187 U. S., 94) reversing the order of the Postmaster-General and in the other (Coyne case, 194 U. S., 497) sustaining that order. What is the power of the Postmaster-General? It is said that the pending bill is dangerously near the border line, because it says that the Commission shall ascertain what, in their judgment, is a reasonable rate. The law authorizing the Postmaster-General to close the mails of this country authorizes him, when he is satisfied that the mail is being used for fraudulent purposes, to intervene. Yet the court under that law, as I said, in the one case made an examination and found that they would sustain the order, and in the other case after investigation they decided that they would not sustain the order.

Under the law relating to the exclusion of Chinese, the court never for one moment suggested it lacked power to inquire into the invasion of constitutional rights, although in habeas corpus proceedings it held that you could not retry the question tried by the Commission and affirmed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Yet in each case the petition failed to show or to allege that in the first instance the Secretary on review failed to exercise the utmost care and caution in the determination of that question.

Again, in the Regan case, while the statute attempted to confer jurisdiction, the court declared that the circuit court, by reason of its general equity power, could entertain the suit.

It would seem as though, in view of this long-continued policy of the court in this respect, there could no longer be any question as to the power of a court of equity, independent of any provision placed by Congress in this bill, to entertain the plea of a citizen if his property was being taken in violation of law.

But the question is asked, If this is so, why do you not provide in this law that the court may do this and do that? We decline to make that provision, Mr. President, upon this theory. We proceeded on the theory that you could not take from nor add to the power of a court sitting in equity; that while you might confer equity jurisdiction over matters which it did not formerly exercise, yet as to the purpose, the purview, the scope of inquiry, the right to search the conscience of the chancellor and his judgment to respond to that search, Congress had no power to place any limitation or to enlarge the functions of the court in that respect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. House bill 12707, the statehood bill.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Minnesota may finish his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. It is so ordered.

Mr. CLAPP. It has been suggested from time to time, not in public debate here, but in the effort to reach a happy solution of this problem, that we should put into the bill this provision or that provision as to what the court may do upon an appeal to the court. The objection on the part of the framers of the bill has been that if such a provision, whatever might be its term, be varied, limited the equity power of the court, then the court when appealed to by the citizen in behalf of his property rights would either have to disregard it, or if the court did regard it it would be a limitation upon the right of the citizen and probably be declared void; so it was deemed safer not to attempt any direction, but leave the equity power of the court as it exists.

In 1887 the State of Minnesota passed an act providing for the creation of a railroad and warehouse commission. That commission made an order fixing rates. The supreme court of that State held that that order was mandatory and refused a plea to the writ of mandamus. The case came here, and the Supreme Court declared the law void, because not that it failed to make provision for a review, but, as declared by the Supreme Court, in its own language it shuts out a judicial investigation.

If we undertake in this bill to prescribe the power of the court in its inquiry and we make that one iota less than the broad power of the court of equity, may we not encounter that selfsame objection? That being in the minds of the men who worked out this bill, it was thought best to leave the court to exercise its power, as it was well defined, as it was easy to understand, and in doing that there would be no question of the constitutionality of this provision.

We were then confronted by another question, and it is the subject of serious objection raised by those who seem to oppose the passage of this bill. Under this bill the order of the Commission is to go into effect within a given time. Under the old law it is provided that if the carrier does not obey the order at the end of thirty days the court brings a suit to enforce the order. That has been the source of endless complaint, the source of an amount of delay probably difficult to definitely determine.

It is usual in creating any tribunal to give to the determination of that tribunal prima facie force and effect. So it was thought best in this instance, instead of having a tribunal make a rate and then go into court to establish the justice of that rate, to give prima facie force to that rate and let the carrier who might complain of the rate go into the court and obtain such relief as the court might grant.

Now, ordinarily the party seeking to avoid the force of a determination or judgment can, pending the determination of its hearing, avoid its force at the first determination by giving a bond; but in this case it seemed impracticable to make such a provision. The difficulty about the carrier securing to the shipper a return of the excess pending an examination of the validity of the order is found in the fact that it is difficult to determine who pays the freight.
